Liberals must now attune themselves to the obvious. They must let the hard-hats, Mr. and Mrs. Middle America, know that they understand what is bugging them, and, they must let America know that they too condemn crime and riots and violence and extreme social turbulence, and that they scorn extremists of the left as well as the extremists of the right—the black extremists with guns and the white extremists with sheets and guns. Just clear the record, make it unequivocal.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ALTHOUGH THE PROCESS has been going on for some 20 years at least, the decay of core cities and the growth of the suburbs that surround them have been highlighted sharply by preliminary results of the 1970 census.

These show that most of the great cities of the United States such as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Detroit have been losing population although the metropolitan area of which they are a part have shown considerable growth.

It has been fashionable of late to attribute this development to the "flight" of affluent white people to the suburbs, leaving the core cities to become black ghettos. Undoubtedly, civil rights conflicts, notably in Washington, D.C., Detroit and similar scenes of burnings and riots, have contributed greatly to the problem.

Yet, the fact that the process has been going on for many years prior to the black and white confrontation of recent years would indicate that other factors may well be at work. In addition, the city-suburb pattern of core city decay and suburb growth has been present in many cities in which civil rights conflicts have been relatively absent.

Examination of the 1970 preliminary census results shows that of the 30 largest metropolitan areas of the United States, only one —Pittsburgh—has lost population since 1960. The loss in Pittsburgh, incidentally, was not large—only a one percent drop of about 23,000 in a population of almost 2.4 million.

All of the rest of these 30 areas have shown great growth. Even such cities as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Detroit which have lost population have increased their metropolitan populations by anywhere from six to 10 percent.

Leaving aside the black-white conflict, the fact is that the pattern of life in all cities has been changing over the years. The change would appear to be largely based on massive alterations in American transportation facilities largely due to the private automobile and American affluence which has made it possible for millions of Americans to buy their own cars.

Industrial slums—the growing obsolescence of factories and lofts that stain so many of today's cities—have driven industry to suburbia and even exurbia as a drive around almost any once-country area will reveal.

An unfortunate aspect of the changing pattern of core city and its suburbs has been a growing hostility of core cities against the waves of one-man, one-automobile commuters that flood the city daily, clogging its streets, taking over its parking spaces and rushing home at night to leave great areas as deserted as the canyons of Wall Street are when day ends for the stock market.

IN MORE THAN ONE SENSE, as the 1970 census figures are telling us, the city-suburban crisis is growing more severe each day, necessitating study of what can be done to meet a situation, the development of which is not likely to be reversed.

Various proposals for a solution have been made over the years. They seek to answer a number of questions: Should city and suburb come together in an organic union to create one big city? Should they develop regional pacts that would involve sharing of common services such as police and fire departments? Should they develop more or less autonomous units such as the borough system?

There have been developments along these various lines. New York City and New Jersey have their Port of New York Authority. The District of Columbia has developed pacts with neighboring Maryland and Virginia counties for the development of an urgently needed mass transit subway system.

Only recently the city of Indianapolis has entered into a partial consolidation with neighboring Marion county in an effort to solve common problems. Called "Unigov," the pact has made Indianapolis the nation's 10th largest city.

The 1970 census is bringing sharply home the inescapable fact that city and suburb must find similar means of cooperation and friendship if they are to resolve their mutual problems.

Union Labor Effort:

National Health Insurance Seen As Major Issue in Elections

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE will be a major campaign issue in this year's congressional elections, Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Social Security predicted in a network radio interview.

Whether a pre-paid comprehensive health care program is adopted in the next Congress will be largely "determined by the results of the November elections," Seidman declared.

If national health insurance isn't enacted in the next Congress, he added, it will be "as important an issue in the 1972 presidential campaign as Medicare was in 1960 and 1964."

He pointed out that such bills are now before both the House and the Senate, and that ironing out "minor differences" between the two bills "should not be very difficult." He added that the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers have pledged a joint effort for the legislation, a goal of the labor movement for more than 30 years.

Seidman said both the bill sponsored by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and the measure introduced by Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John S. Cooper (R-Ky.) provide the necessary "incentives" for the needed expansion and change of the health care delivery system.

He warned that delaying the program until the needed delivery system exists, as Administration spokesmen have urged, would mean that "we will never have either the delivery system or national health insurance."

Questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Jerome Brazda, editor of Washington Report on Medicine and Health, and Frank Swoboda, labor correspondent for Business Week magazine.

PRE-PAID COMPREHENSIVE health care for all Americans will be a major 1970 election issue, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine and Health.

Clothing Workers Expanding Project:

Day Care for Tots

While pressing in Congress for a federal system of day care centers for children of working mothers, the Clothing Workers' own program continues to flourish.

ACWA day care facilities are operating in Baltimore, Staunton, Va., and Chicago. Two more centers are expected to open shortly in the southeastern Pennsylvania apparel districts.

A majority of ACWA members are women, and many of these are mothers. One of the more serious problems they face is care for their pre-school children during working hours.

But a significant step toward a solution of this problem was taken by the ACWA Baltimore Joint Board in the late 1960s when it developed the first day care project ever undertaken by a trade union in the United States.

With the construction and part of the operating expenses absorbed by employers, the members who make use of the facilities pay only a small fee for the services. At private day care centers working mothers have to pay up to $25 a week for each child.

The tots receive supervised recreation, hot lunches, and pre-school education. They also get a close watch on their health.

102nd Trades Union Congress:

British Unions Fight Pay Curb, Labor Law

Brighton, England—Britain's trade unions closed ranks at the 102nd Trades Union Congress here and pledged to resist attacks on collective bargaining goals and procedures by the new Conservative Party government of Prime Minister Edward Heath.

The 1,000 TUC delegates voted unanimously:

● To reject government efforts to curb wage increases by forcing workers in nationalized industries such as railroads, coal mining and electric utilities to take lower wage increases than workers in other industries negotiated earlier this year.

The Heath Administration is seeking to stem pay hikes that have been running at about 12 percent this year.

● To oppose restrictive collective bargaining legislation sought by the Heath Administration—the equivalent of a Taft-Hartley Act for British unions.

● To tell the government that a tough bargain must be made in Brussels with representatives of the European Common Market if the trade unions are to encourage Britain's entry into the trade pact.

Victor Feather, general secretary of the TUC, delighted delegates by wading into Conservative government policies on all fronts.

But Feather also sounded a note of caution, stressing that labor's "use of the strike weapon must be intelligent and sparing."

This advice follows nine months of the heaviest round of strikes in the post-war period as British workers sought to make up for wage losses during four years of "wage restraints" which ended last December.

Feather, who succeeded George Woodcock as TUC general secretary last year, asked delegates to give the Trades Union Congress more authority so as to prevent the Conservative Party from mounting a convincing case for government intervention in bargaining.

Delegates approved a policy which will attempt to form groups of unions into industrial bargaining units, to deal with the problems arising from a multiplicity of unions representing workers at the same establishment.

While taking a cautious approach to the issue of stronger TUC authority, union leaders speaking from the floor were unanimous in opposition to the government's "reform" proposals.

In a foreign policy resolution, the TUC again called for United States withdrawal from Viet Nam.

Delegates were divided on the Common Market issue but endorsed the "wait and see" position recommended by the TUC general council by a vote of 6,073,000 to 1,361,000, with delegates voting the membership strength of their unions.

Jack Jones of the Transport Workers led a floor attack on the government's wage policy and told delegates that his union, which represents a number of low-paid workers, will be seeking a minimum wage of 20 pounds a week for its members ($48 in the rate of exchange but somewhat more in terms of buying power). The TUC as a whole has a national goal that no worker should be paid less than 16 pounds, 10 shillings.

Tipton Elected President of Rail Foremen

Chicago—General chairmen of the Railway Supervisors elected James R. Tipton, Southern Railway general chairman, president at the organization's three-day biennial convention here.

Tipton, former second vice president of the union, succeeds James P. Tahney, president since the organization was founded in 1934, who died on the eve of the convention.

The new president won a three-way race, defeating Financial Sec.-Treas. R. R. McGuire and Recording Sec. H. E. Maschger.

The general chairmen re-elected four incumbent members of the board of directors. Terms of a number of other officers do not expire until 1972.

Tipton, 50, of Chattanooga, Tenn., began railroading as a machinist apprentice for the Southern at Knoxville in 1940. By 1951, he had advanced to night roundhouse foreman at Bulls Gap, Tenn., and he joined the Railway Supervisors, becoming a committeeman.

He was elected district chairman at Knoxville in 1957 and general chairman of the Southern in 1958. He was named a vice president in 1961.

The convention approved a board action combining the positions of corresponding secretary and recording secretary.

Retired Vice Pres. Matthew Fiet, a charter member, read a resolution paying tribute to Tahney as part of a memorial service.

In a telegram read to the convention, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed "profound sorrow" at Tahney's death but voiced confidence that the union's "forward-looking policies . . . will continue without faltering."

Speakers included Charles J. Chamberlain, president of the Railroad Signalmen and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association; Howard W. Habermeyer, chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board and several management and government officials.

Labor Summer Schools Attended by 15,000

Labor's 120 summer schools, covering every state, were attended by 15,000 trade unionist students this year, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter Davis reported.

A wide range of subjects, including high level "tool" courses for union executives, are being taught, Davis said. He listed such subjects as collective bargaining, the economy, pollution, legislation and political action for local union leadership and rank-and-file members, and basic classes from elementary unionism to literacy lessons.

The schools are run by international unions, state federations and regional groups.

The choice of students is up to the local unions. But most unions, like the Machinists, seek as students "active members who will return from schools and put their knowledge to work for the union." The Machinists run an extensive summer school program at 22 locations, focusing this year on specialized, non-partisan political training.

The Steelworkers' 16 summer schools, all held at universities around the country, conduct a unique four-year summer program. Unionist-students graduate from first-year "basic unionism" courses to advanced studies in such areas as "psychology for union stewards," and cultural appreciation involving attendance at plays and similar experiences.

Although some unions — like the Ladies' Garment Workers—offered summer schools prior to World War II, the post-war years saw a big splurge in their growth, Davis noted.

One union active in this field is the Communications Workers whose education director, Holgate Young, uses mixed media programs, featuring rock music and light shows, to answer such questions as: "Are unions necessary?" "Are these hard times or good times?" and "Will unions be stronger or weaker by 1980?"

National unions, which run 80 percent of the summer schools, emphasize the development of new union leadership through focusing on union-oriented subject areas.

For example, the Government Employes holds sessions on collective bargaining, union administration, steward training and similar subjects as they function within the framework of the federal governmental setup.

The State, County & Municipal Employes offers a continuing program of staff training for national and local union staffs who are brought in—15 every two months—to study at one-week schools on the University of Maryland campus.

State and regional schools attract students from diverse unions in the same geographic region.

The recent Tri-State Labor School in Raleigh, N.C., for example, represented a student cross-section from the Tobacco Workers, the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Hospital Workers, the Meat Cutters, the Plumbers and the Machinists.

Summer institutes now constitute the largest part of the labor education program. In the future, they will operate all year around, Davis predicted.

U.S. Opposes New Isolationism, AFL-CIO Delegates Tell TUC

Brighton, England—The AFL-CIO is vigorously opposed to "all attempts to revive American isolationism," Federation Vice Pres. Thomas W. Gleason told the British Trades Union Congress here.

Gleason's address on U.S. foreign policy problems was coupled with a review of domestic economic policies by Vice Pres. I. W. Abel who told the TUC that Pres. Nixon "is not yet listening" to labor's proposals for an anti-recession program.

Gleason, president of the Longshoremen, and Abel, president of the Steelworkers, addressed the TUC as fraternal delegates, the latest exchange in a long historic series between the trade union centers of the two nations.

In his address Gleason noted that the AFL-CIO will "have no truck with those in our land who would have the United States run out on or reduce its international responsibilities." If the U.S. were to turn its back on those responsibilities, "there could be no lasting world peace," he said.

He pointed out that the U.S. has opposed cutback of U.S. forces in Europe, supported all proposals to strengthen NATO to make it a more effective instrument for assuring democratic Europe's security.

Gleason told the TUC that "we have supported our Administration's policy of systematically de-escalating the conflict in Indo-China and seeking a just and honorable peace in Viet Nam."

He stressed that American labor had "time and again urged our government to provide Israel with generous economic and adequate military assistance so that she can assure her security and economic progress as a democracy and live in peace with her Arab neighbors."

He called on "free trade unions everywhere" to urge their governments to support the Israelis, especially in view of the Soviet military involvement in the region.

Recalling the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 and the earlier invasion of Hungary in 1956, Gleason declared that "these crimes demonstrate beyond challenge" the illusion of nations about international detente and "liberalization behind the Iron Curtain."

Abel cited the victories of American labor in its showdown battle with General Electric, the organization of the farm workers, the long strike in the non-ferrous metals industry and the establishment of collective bargaining in the postal system.

Turning to the economic situation, which he termed "unfortunate" and stemming from "ill-advised" government policies, Abel said that in the 20 months of the Nixon Administration the rate of inflation had moved up from 4 to 6 percent, the rate of unemployment had increased from 3.3 to 5 percent and interest rates from 6 to 9 percent.

The Administration's policies, he stressed, coupled with the "corporate greed" that caused the inflation of the 1960s has brought about a situation that requires unions to press for substantial improvements in wages and fringes.

He tagged as "utter nonsense" the idea that the worker "who didn't cause the problem in the first place is expected to pay the price for slowing inflation through joblessness and restraint at the bargaining table."

Abel told the TUC that he hoped it would, with the AFL-CIO, set up some mechanism for coordinating national trade programs that would prevent multinational corporations from playing one country off against the other.

The job, he said, is to establish labor standards which will make it difficult for companies to get a labor cost advantage by going abroad and will result in "fair trade."

Office Union Wins Votes at 2 Banks

New York—The Office & Professional Employes, backed by the AFL-CIO in a nationwide drive to offer the benefits of organization to bank employes, has scored two initial victories in the states of Missouri and Washington.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin said the union won National Labor Relations Board elections by a 3-1 margin in a 45-member unit at the First Federal Savings & Loan Association, Vancouver, Wash., and by nearly 2-1 among 81 employes of North County Bank & Trust Co., in Jennings, Mo., a St. Louis suburb.

OPEIU has numerous bank campaigns under way, Coughlin said.

West Virginia Unions Press Election Goals

Charleston—The West Virginia AFL-CIO gave top priority at a special convention to the election of progressive state legislators in November and to winning the right of collective bargaining for public employes through a state labor-management relations act.

The convention adopted a legislative "program for progress" that included protection for consumers, reorganization of the state government and legislature, a prevailing wage-rate law and other issues of importance to workers.

Delegates passed a resolution calling on all labor families to register and vote for COPE-endorsed candidates, and to tell their legislators with one strong voice that the time has come for positive action on a better public education program, for elimination of job discrimination, a uniform state building code and reactivation of a state-wide housing program.

The convention endorsed 63 Democrats and 6 Republican candidates for the legislature. Pres. Miles C. Stanley and Sec.-Treas, Glen Armstrong reported.

Administration Plan Hit:

Labor Opposes Tax, Asks Pollutant Ban

A tax on lead gasoline additives "is the worst way of raising tax revenues and probably the least effective method of reducing air pollution," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Strongly opposing the Administration's proposed $4.25 per pound excise on lead that would raise the cost of gasoline by two to two and one-half cents a gallon, the federation urged Administration support of air-pollution control legislation now before Congress which would empower the government to remove from commerce all gasoline additives.

In testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller also voiced the AFL-CIO's opposition to extension of excise taxes on automobiles and communications services and repeated labor's views on why the Administration's proposed Domestic International Sales Corporation tax plan should be rejected as a $600 million giveaway to large corporations.

In sum, said Biemiller, the "Administration's tax recommendations will fall far short of the stated objectives of the proposals and come nowhere near meeting the real needs of the economy."

The Administration programs, he said, "at best represent weak and halting responses" and are basically "patchwork efforts" to reduce the size of the budget deficit. He warned that passage might actually impede tax reform and "progress toward effective air-pollution legislation."

The lead gasoline additive tax would be "clearly a license to pollute, if you pay the price." Noting that the AFL-CIO is "flatly opposed to the use of leaded gasoline and any other atmosphere-polluting additives," Biemiller said the way to achieve the clean air goal is through the control legislation in Congress and Administration support to assure passage.

The Administration's proposals to add one year to the scheduled phase-out in excise taxes on autos and telephone services was opposed by Biemiller who said that "maintaining a regressive, inequitable tax for an additional year is just as unfair as seeking new sales taxes or higher rates on old ones."

Presently the automobile excise is 7 percent and the phone excise 10 percent. Both are scheduled to be reduced to 5 percent on Jan. 1, 1971 and phased out completely by the end of 1973. The Administration is seeking to continue the rates during 1971 and phase out the levy at the end of 1974.

On Administration proposals for acceleration in gift and estate-tax payments, Biemiller said "the AFL-CIO has no objection to requiring a faster payment of estate and gift taxes. We feel, however, that the Administration has gone overboard in assuring that no estate will be unduly burdened."

As to the overall problems of the economy and especially the federal budget deficit, the AFL-CIO pointed out that "this is not because of excessive federal spending, it is because tax receipts are less than expected, the automatic result of a faltering economy."

asked that the government use revenue funds to cover one-half the cost of the program. The premium has increased nearly 80 percent in four years from $3 per month to $5.30 per month.

Noting the House bill's increase of the wage base on which social security taxes are figured to $9,000, Biemiller said it is a step in the right direction but that it ought to move to $15,000 as urged by the AFL-CIO to finance broader benefits and lessen the "regressivity of the tax."

He urged also that general revenue funds be introduced into the system on a regularly scheduled basis to remove an increasingly unfair burden on low and middle-income workers.

House bill changes in the Medicaid program "cause us great concern," he said, especially repeal of the provision in the present law that states must have comprehensive Medicaid programs by 1977.

5 Liberals Winners In Key Senate Races

Earl D. Craig, Jr., a strong critic of the Johnson and Nixon Viet Nam policies. Humphrey will be opposed in November by GOP Rep. Clark MacGregor, who got almost 90 percent of the vote in his race against John D. Baucom, Jr., who described himself as "a proud member of the John Birch Society since 1963."

Tydings won renomination in Maryland by a 60,000-vote margin, half the size of his first primary victory in 1964. Tydings needed a big margin in Baltimore and the Washington, D.C., suburbs to best George P. Mahoney, a conservative 68-year-old Baltimore contractor who has now lost nine state-wide races in Maryland. Tydings will face Rep. J. Glenn Beall, Jr., who won the GOP primary by a 5-1 margin over two opponents.

Jackson, like Humphrey, also beat back the challenge of a Viet Nam critic. Jackson's margin over Carl Maxey, a Negro, was also similar to Humphrey's as he won nearly 80 percent of the vote. Jackson will be opposed in November by State Sen. Charles Elicker, who won the GOP nomination.

Pastore breezed in Rhode Island with a margin of almost 8-1 over his first primary opponent in 20 years. Pastore will face a Jesuit priest, the Rev. John McLaughlin, who was unopposed in the Republican primary.

Even though unopposed on the Massachusetts ballot, Kennedy drew 73 percent of the vote. He will be opposed by Josiah A. Spaulding, a former GOP state chairman and maverick Republican who defeated John J. McCarthy, a strong Administration supporter.

Spaulding was one of the winners in an active Massachusetts primary which also saw a priest upset an incumbent congressman. Boston Mayor Kevin White won a squeaker for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination and Mrs. Louise Day Hicks picked up the Democratic nomination for the House seat being vacated by Speaker John McCormack.

A Boston College dean, the Rev. Robert F. Drinan, S.J., beat 72-year-old Rep. Philip J. Philbin by some 5,000 votes. No priest has served in Congress since 1823, but Drinan and McLaughlin bring the total who have won primaries to three—Wisconsin Democrats earlier nominated the Rev. Robert J. Cornell for a House seat.

White emerged the narrow victor in the Massachusetts governor's race over labor-supported Maurice A. Donahue, president of the state senate. Nearly complete returns gave White 212,000 votes to 202,000 for Donahue, 124.000 for Lt. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti and 44,000 for former John F. Kennedy aide Kenneth O'Donnell. In November, White will face incumbent Gov. Francis Sargent, who was unopposed in the primary.

The woman White beat in 1967 to become mayor of Boston, Mrs. Hicks, emerged with the Democratic nomination to succeed McCormack after two liberals, John J. Moakley and Negro David S. Nelson, split about 60 percent of the vote. Mrs. Hicks, whose "You know where I stand" campaign against integrated schools attracted nation-wide attention in 1967, stuck mostly to a radio campaign in winning this time, refusing to meet her opponents in debate.

In other governor's races, Maryland Gov. Marvin Mandel won an easy victory over three opponents —polling 150,000 more votes than Tydings—and will face former Spiro Agnew aide C. Stanley Blair in the general election. Blair won the GOP nomination by a 5-1 margin over two opponents.

In Rhode Island, Republicans nominated Atty, Gen. Herbert F. DeSimone to oppose incumbent Gov. Frank Licht.

In Minnesota, State Sen. Wendell Anderson, a close political ally of Humphrey, won the Democratic nomination for governor and will face state Atty. Gen. Douglas Head in November. Minnesota Gov. Harold LeVander is retiring.

In Oklahoma, Tulsa attorney David Hall won a run-off over State Sen. Bryce Baggett in a Democratic gubernatorial primary in which consolidation of small rural school districts emerged as a major issue. Hall will face incumbent Dewey Bartlett in November.

In other congressional races, the chairman of the House Public Works Committee, George H. Fallon of Maryland, was apparently upset by Baltimore liberal Paul S. Serbanes, a member of the House of Delegates endorsed by Maryland COPE. Another committee chairman from Maryland, labor-endorsed Samuel N. Friedel, won a narrow victory over Parran J. Mitchell, a Negro college professor.

Complete but unofficial returns gave Serbanes 22,602 votes to 20,120 for Fallon while Friedel had 23,491 to 23,309 for Mitchell.

In Minnesota, Rep. Donald Fraser, chairman of the liberal Democratic Study Group, handily beat back the challenge of conservative Joe Greenstein, a Minneapolis alderman.

Dystrophy Telethon Raises $5 Million

New York — The Labor Day television effort for the relief of muscular dystrophy sufferers raised more than $5 million with labor help, Chairman Jerry Lewis said.

Among those who appeared on the coast-to-coast telethon were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, Pres. Frederick O'Neal of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America and Executive Sec. Thomas Donahue of the Service Employes. O'Neal was labor chairman and Donahue assistant chairman.

Senate Foes Prevent Electoral Reform Vote

Senate debate, however. Supporters of the amendment have expressed the view that the battle would be won if the President and his aides would actively solicit votes.

Under the proposal being considered by the Senate, the presidential ticket with the most votes nationwide would be elected, providing it polled at least 40 percent of the total vote. If no ticket received 40 percent, there would be a runoff. Several alternative proposals aimed at eliminating the runoff situation were scheduled to be considered by the Senate before the final vote.

In other major congressional developments:

● The Senate drastically weakened a House-passed bill aimed at forcing the breakup of "one-bank holding companies" — conglomerates of banking and non-banking enterprises leading to a concentration of economic power.

The AFL-CIO had urged all senators to support an amendment by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) which would have closed an "onerous" loophole exempting more than 80 percent of bank conglomerates from the law. But the amendment was rejected, 37-34, as bank officials and lobbyists looked on from the galleries.

The bill now goes to conference, where House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) has served notice he will fight hard for the tougher House version.

● The House gave final approval to a conference agreement on a bill limiting the amount that candidates for political office can spend on radio and television advertising. It applies to candidates for president, vice president, the House and Senate, governor and lieutenant governor. The ceiling is based on 7 cents for each vote cast for that office in the preceding election.

The bill also limits the cost of political broadcasting by requiring radio and television stations to sell time at their lowest commercial rates.

The Senate is expected to approve the measure. But even if the President signs it promptly, it would have little effect on this year's election since the bill does not take effect until 30 days after it is signed.

● The Senate prepared to take up—in the night sessions it is holding while debating electoral reform during the day—a major, labor-supported manpower bill which includes a large-scale public service employment program.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed its enactment "of critical importance."

Especially during high unemployment periods, Biemiller said, the private sector is unable to provide full employment and states and cities are unable to finance needed programs to train and hire workers for "meaningful" jobs.

Steelworkers Win Vote at Holdout Firm

Meriden, Conn.—The Steelworkers marked up an election victory that answered a question USWA Pres. I. W. Abel asked a year ago about union representation at nine plants of the International Silver Corp.

Abel's question, on a visit here, was "Who represents the employes?" The answer was "No union." On his return to Pittsburgh, Abel asked Organizing Dir. Elmer Chatak to explore the feasibility of a campaign.

The ensuing campaign, supported by the Connecticut AFL-CIO and four central labor councils in the area, led to a National Labor Relations Board election. The union won, 1,524 to 1,105, with 423 challenged ballots cast by laid-off employes.

State Council Pres. John J. Driscoll said Insilco is "the last big anti-union corporation" in the state.

Wages Still Lag as CPI Rise Slows

By John R. Oravec

The rise in the nation's consumer price index slowed its pace in August, but the buying power of the average worker continued to lag behind the year-ago level—just as it has for 17 consecutive months.

Real spendable earnings for a worker with three dependents edged up 24 cents from July to $78.49, but were still 38 cents less than in August 1969, the monthly report of the Labor Dept. showed.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the consumer price index rose two-tenths of 1 percent in August to another new high of 136. It was the smallest month-to-month increase since December 1968.

The August increase in prices put all consumer items covered by the index 5.7 percent above the year-ago level, BLS noted.

The CPI advance to 136 percent of the 1957-59 base period means that it cost $13.60 for goods and services that could be purchased for $10 little more than a decade ago.

Higher prices for consumer services accounted for almost all of the July-to-August increase. Commodity prices rose slightly, while gasoline, used cars and grocery store food prices declined, the BLS said.

Seasonally adjusted, the August increase in the CPI was also two-tenths of 1 percent. This compares with advances of three-tenths of 1 percent in the two previous months and an average rise of five-tenths of 1 percent earlier in 1970, the BLS noted.

Marland Held Unfit for Key Education Post

The AFL-CIO still considers Sidney P. Marland, Jr., unfit to be U.S. Commissioner of Education and will "fight this nomination vigorously when it comes before the Senate for confirmation."

Federation Pres. George Meany termed the nomination an affront to teachers "and a threat to the future of public education."

Meany described Marland as "an outspoken enemy of the right of teachers to join together in organizations of their own choosing" and warned of a conflict of interest arising out of his "close relationship to industrial leaders who are greedy

Senate Approves Plan For Public Service Jobs

The Senate voted 68-6 approval of a manpower training bill that includes a large-scale public service employment program long urged by the AFL-CIO.

The legislation, which still must be acted on by the House, earmarks a large share of federal manpower funds for states and cities to hire and train unemployed workers for "necessary and vital" public service employment.

If the full amount authorized in the legislation were appropriated, it would result in creating an estimated 250,000 job slots with federal payment of 80 percent of the cost.

As AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller stressed in a letter urging senators to support the bill, "it provides manpower to carry out important community needs in such areas as public protection, health, education, pollution and recretation. The bill calls for legitimate job creation, not leaf-raking and other so-called 'make-work' tasks."

Under the Senate bill, states and cities would have broad flexibility

Deadline Extended In Railroad Dispute

By Eugene A. Kelly

Negotiators for 18,000 diesel locomotive firemen and major American railroads bargained past a midnight deadline Sept. 23 and then agreed to extend the talks further in the hope of settling their 11-year-old dispute by agreement.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson announced that "the parties"—the United Transportation Union and railroad managements—"agreed to continue negotiations for a period not to exceed two weeks." The UTU said, however, that no time limit had been set.

"We agreed to keep talking, period," said UTU Assistant Pres. H. E. Gilbert, who headed the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen until its merger with three other unions to form the UTU.

The dispute involves the place of the fireman-helper in the cab of the diesel freight engine. The union claims another pair of eyes is needed in the cab besides the engineer's, but management has disputed the claim. A presidential emergency board recommended in August that the fireman's job be combined with that of the brakeman and that is what current negotiations are all about.

In a separate dispute, Pres. Nixon named a five-member emergency board to recommend a settlement of wage and other contract issues involving all major railroads and four unions representing 400,000 railroad workers.

The unions are the Railway & Airline Clerks, the Maintenance of Way Employes, the dining car section of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and the UTU, whose members include railroad trainmen,

Asks Action By Congress Early in '71

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed health care "a basic human right" and said the sooner Congress acts on national health insurance, the better it will be for the American people.

Meany appeared before the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee to affirm labor's "complete, unequivocal support" for national health insurance and to stress the urgency of the problem.

The Nixon Administration lost no time in denouncing national health insurance legislation as too costly and not the "proper" approach.

Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John G. Veneman told the committee that the Administration "simply cannot subscribe to the idea that we must now break—utterly and totally—with the past."

The hearings, chaired by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), marked the first public exploration of national health insurance in 20 years. Meany conceded that Congress will not be able to reshape the nation's health care system in the few weeks remaining to the 91st Congress.

But, he emphasized, "We do want action early in the next session. The need is too great and too urgent for Congress to delay acting on national health insurance beyond 1971."

He called on Congress to combine the best features of the "carefully thought out" bills introduced by a bipartisan group of senators

Limit on TV Campaigns Put Squarely Up to Nixon

Its up to Pres. Nixon whether and when to sign a bill limiting the amount political candidates can spend for radio and television time and opening the way to debates among major candidates.

The Senate sent the bill to the White House by a 60-19 vote, with 18 of the opposing votes cast by Republicans who complained publicly that the bill was "loosely drawn" and privately that it would wipe out the big spending advantage most Republican candidates have over their Democratic opponents.

Under the new labor-supported legislation, the spending limit for air time would be 7 cents for each vote cast in the last election for the office or $20,000, whichever was higher. Stations would have to sell the time at their lowest commercial rates.

If the President does sign the bill, he is likely to wait the full 10 days allowed. Since the bill does not take effect until 30 days after it is signed, it would be too late to become operative for this November's election.

Postal Unions Form Council ForBargaining

Unions representing the nation's 700,000 postal workers have agreed to speak with one voice at the bargaining table—and to explore eventual merger into a single postal union.

All seven unions holding exclusive national collective bargaining rights in the U.S. Postal Service joined in forming the new Council of American Postal Employes (CAPE). The founding unions include six AFL-CIO affiliates and the Rural Letter Carriers.

The council said its immediate goal "is to present a united front of all postal workers in the negotiations on a new national agreement which are scheduled to start within 30 days."

It endorsed as a "pressing aim" the "total merger of all postal employes into one big postal union."

Working towards that objective, representatives of several of the unions have moved immediately into merger talks and the Postal Clerks have proposed merger negotiations to the National Postal Union, the largest organization of postal workers not in the council.

Meanwhile, the seven participating unions have set up a committee to draft a constitution for CAPE and to draw up a plan for comparable state and local councils. Union educational programs for postal workers are among the planned CAPE activities.

Participating unions are the Letter Carriers, the Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers, Special Delivery Messengers and the Motor Vehicle Employes, as well as the Postal Clerks and the Rural Letter Carriers.

The same seven unions worked together last spring in negotiations coordinated by the AFL-CIO in the aftermath of a wave of strikes.

The resulting agreement with the Post Office led to congressional enactment of a double pay raise for all postal workers and a broad-ranging collective bargaining system as part of the new U.S. Postal Service.

OIL PAINTINGS by active and retired members of the Ladies' Garment Workers are viewed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The ILGWU traveling art show was on exhibition at the federation headquarters Sept. 22-25.

Labor Urges Hodgson To Prod Struck Airline

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the presidents of five unions with airline membership called on Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson to intervene in the 11-week-old dispute between Northwest Airlines and the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Their message urged that Hodgson's "good offices be brought to bear to assure good faith collective bargaining by Northwest and the restoration of flight services."

In another development, the Air Line Pilots filed suit asking the District of Columbia federal district court to assess $10 million damages against Northwest because of its participation in a 10-carrier mutual assistance pact. ALPA asked an injunction restraining pact payments to Northwest until the company stops violating the Railway Labor Act.

Meany was joined in his appeal to Hodgson by Presidents C. L. Dennis of the striking Clerks, Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists, Charles H. Ruby of the Pilots and Robert E. Commerce of the Air Line Dispatchers.

They said BRAC, fully supported by the AFL-CIO and the other unions representing Northwest employes, has tried to bring about a contract settlement but has been turned down by the management.

Northwest, they charged, has "flouted its responsibilities as a public carrier, has made a mockery of the bargaining process in its effort to maintain substandard rates and conditions far below those of comparable classifications on other lines."

The message declared that the airline had illegally and unilaterally introduced changes in wage rates that had been rejected by union negotiators.

The suit against Northwest was filed on behalf of 1,300 pilots who were laid off July 8 when the clerks went on strike.

Under the mutual aid pact, nine other airlines pay Northwest a minimum guarantee for flight operations shut down during the strike. During another recent strike, National Airlines collected more than $28 million under the pact.

The ALPA suit charges that Northwest violated the Railway Labor Act by relying on pact payments instead of settling its dispute at the bargaining table, and by unlawfully changing pilot working conditions.

Pilots lost more than $10 million in pay and benefits, the suit maintains.

Previously ALPA appealed a Civil Aeronautics Board decision to the D.C. Court of Appeals. The union is challenging the lagality of the mutual aid arrangement which the CAB approved.

Meanwhile, Frontier Airlines was warned by the Air Line Employes that it must decide soon whether to meet industry standards or face a system-wide shutdown. The National Mediation Board said ALEA is free to strike any time after Oct. 4.

West Coast Post Filled by Musicians

New York—Musicians Pres. Hal Davis named Sam Middleman, his assistant since 1968, as West Coast representative of the union, with headquarters in Los Angeles. Middleman succeeds Ernie Lewis, who died in August.

Jailings, Fines Prolong Bitter School Disputes

Jailings of striking teachers in New Haven, Conn., and threats of jail in Toledo, O., marked disputes that delayed the start of the school semester for eight local unions of the American Federation of Teachers and two dozen affiliates of the National Education Association.

Sixteen union teachers chose to go to jail in New Haven rather than pay fines of $100 each for shunning school. Two were released for health reasons but the others are in the Whalley Ave. jail in New Haven and the Niantic State Prison for Women.

The fines were set by Superior Court Judge Douglass B. Wright, who also fined 400 West Haven teachers a total of $2,000 for striking to win a settlement.

AFT Pres. David Selden pledged full support of the strikers and called jailings "another example of abuse of judicial power to coerce public workers." Selden told the school board: "Honest, good-faith bargaining will settle strikes. Jail sentences only prolong them and leave a residue of bitterness."

Toledo teachers, who returned to classrooms Sept. 18 after staying out for 10 days, decided to walk out again after the school board recessed contract talks "indefinitely" Sept. 21.

Philadelphia teachers were locked out by the school board, which finally opened the doors Sept. 15 in an agreement to arbitrate. Elsewhere strikes by union locals shut schools at East St. Louis, Ill., Highland Park and Inkster, Mich., and Nashua, N.H. The AFT strikes comprised the smallest number in recent years.

In Nashua the school board asked for an order restraining the strike but a state court judge refused, saying there is no reason to issue an injunction.

Selden said East St. Louis teachers have been out since Aug. 31. Six of the seven school board members are involved in investigations over alleged misconduct, he said.

Inkster teachers voted to strike after the school board turned down a fact-finder's recommendation for pay increases.

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service reported it has helped settle nine disputes between NEA units and school districts, including a strike of 2,600 high school teachers in suburbs of Salt Lake City and a dispute at the University of Cincinnati between faculty and administration.

Director J. Curtis Counts said school disputes currently being mediated include those in Dayton, O., Fisk University at Nashville, Tenn., Oklahoma City and East St. Louis.

Emergency Board Named:

Railroad Disputes Enter New Phase

switchmen, conductors and firemen.

The four unions originally set a Sept. 10 deadline in the wage and work-rule negotiations but extended the date five days at the Administration's request.

Union members on three railroads stopped work Sept. 15 but returned when a federal judge in Washington, D.C. issued a temporary restraining order. The order became moot—legally dead—when Pres. Nixon named a panel of inquiry.

The panel was preparing to set a date for meetings with both sides when the AFL-CIO News went to press. Lewis M. Gill of Merion, Pa., a veteran arbitrator, is chairman. Other members are arbitrators who live in the Washington area—Robert O. Boyd, William H. Coburn, Jacob Seidenberg and Rolf Valtin.

The Railway Labor Act requires the emergency board to file its report and recommendations for a settlement with the White House within 30 days. During that period and for 30 days thereafter, the unions may not strike over the issues in dispute and managements may not engage in any lockout.

Hodgson and Assistant Sec. W. J. Usery said the panel will inquire into two separate disputes—one involving a contract with an operating union, the UTU, and the other contract matters affecting non-operating unions—the Clerks, the waymen and dining car employes. The two were combined into one for the inquiry, they said.

Negotiators for the four unions charge that the carriers have not really tried to reach agreement, but have instead showed "absolute inflexibility" in talks that first started more than a year ago.

Heading the union bargainers are UTU Pres. Charles Luna, BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis, Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Waymen and Vice Pres. Richard Smith of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

In the fireman dispute, the UTU is fighting to save the jobs of 18,000 members. Congress passed a special law in 1963 under which a panel allowed railroads to lay off or eliminate the jobs of firemen on diesel freight trains.

When the award expired in 1965, the union called for new negotiations to settle the issue in collective bargaining. No final settlement had been reached in June, when the talks broke off.

The UTU then struck three railroads to bring management into "meaningful" face-to-face bargaining, and Nixon named an emergency board to hold hearings and report back.

The board urged both sides in the dispute to accept the "basic ingredients of a long-range settlement" they had informally agreed to during mediation talks in June, and negotiations resumed until the latest crisis.

The major recommendation of the board was that the dispute be settled by creating a new job classification combining the duties of firemen and brakemen. Another recommendation was that management make a "meaningful" distribution of operating savings between engineers and other engine crew members whose responsibilities were increased.

Before the latest talks were resumed, Gilbert said he was not optimistic about a final settlement. He believes the railroads want Congress to intervene, he said.

David Stowe Nominated For Mediation Board

David H. Stowe, Washington, D.C., labor relations man who has served as a referee for the National Mediation Board and on special boards in labor disputes, has been nominated by Pres. Nixon for a three-year term on the NMB succeeding Leverett Edwards. The three-member board mediates railroad and airline disputes under the Railway Labor Act.

Sheet Metal Workers Set Wage Parity Drive

Atlantic City—The Sheet Metal Workers are focusing on an all-out effort to boost wages of their craft members working for railroads to parity with other segments of the transportation industry.

Delegates to the union's 33rd convention here directed the Sheet Metal Workers' railroad department "to secure wages" for railroad employes that are "commensurate with their skills and responsibilities."

The convention also signaled the start of a drive to revoke the incidental work rule that was imposed on railroad sheet metal workers by Congress earlier this year.

Citing the nation's need for improved health care for all citizens, the convention also called on Congress to adopt the proposed national health insurance program that carries a broad endorsement of the entire labor movement. A resolution urged members and locals throughout the country to press for passage of the legislation through appeals to congressmen and senators.

Edward J. Carlough

A pension plan to cover full-time officials and employes of locals and union councils was initated by the convention to go into operation next Jan. 1.

The pension fund will be administered by the international with locals, district and state councils contributing an amount equal to 10 percent of an employe's salary.

Earlier in the convention, delegates elected Edward J. Carlough, director of the union's organizing department since 1960, to succeed his father, Edward F. Carlough, as president. The elder Carlough, who had headed the Sheet Metal Workers since 1959, declined to seek another four-term as president.

Goal of 300 New Ships:

Merchant Fleet Plan Approved by Senate

The Senate joined the House in voting near-unanimous approval of a labor-supported program to revitalize the U.S. merchant marine.

Both bills set a goal of building 300 vessels in American yards during the next 10 years, and sending them to sea flying the American flag and manned by U.S. seamen.

A House-Senate conference committee will seek to resolve differences between the two measures and final action before adjournment is considered certain in view of the strong bipartisan support. The Senate passed its bill, 68-1; the House last spring voted 307-1 approval.

The Senate bill retains a labor-supported provision of existing law—requiring that all components of ships built with federal subsidies be American-made. The Administration had sought to repeal this "buy American" provision entirely and the House bill would have required only that "major components" of the hull and superstructure be manufactured in the United States.

The Senate also tightened House language giving presently unsubsidized ship operators 20 years to dispose of their foreign-flag interests if they take advantage of the new construction subsidy program.

Both bills extend to all ship operators the right to qualify for construction subsidies, which previously had been limited to berth-line operators whose ships follow scheduled trade routes.

The legislation recognizes the Great Lakes as a fourth seaport, making lake vessels eligible for federal subsidies for the first time.

Operating subsidies would also be expanded, with the goal of encouraging construction and American-flag operation of bulk cargo ships.

An important provision of the bill looks to construction of even more than the 300 subsidized vessels through a tax-deferment policy that would enable ship owners to build up capital reserves for construction of new American-built vessels.

Still another section of the legislation is designed to lower shipping costs for Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and other offshore and "noncontiguous" areas.

The legislation is designed to reverse the decline of the American-flag merchant marine, which ever since World War II has been carrying a dwindling portion of world trade.

In the process, its supporters told the Senate, it will create thousands of jobs in depressed U.S. shipyards and it will bring about an improved U.S. balance of payments as more and more goods are shipped under the American flag, instead of foreign-flag vessels.

UNION LABEL GRAPES graced every table at the 13th convention of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO in Boston. Council Pres. Salvatore Camelio, right, accepts California grapes from Marcos Nunez of the United Farm Workers and Council Vice Pres. Helen T. O'Donnell accepts a bunch from Stanley Dominick of the Meat Cutters and the state body's union label committee.

Hearings Seek Safety Guides In Construction

Informal public hearings on proposed safety and health standards covering federal construction projects are scheduled for five key cities across the country, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson announced.

The Secretary is required under the 1969 Construction Safety Act to set standards for workers on federal or federally-financed construction projects of more than $2,000.

The two-day hearings will be held in New York City, Nov. 30-Dec. 1; Atlanta and Chicago, Dec. 3-4, and Dallas and San Francisco, Dec. 7-8.

Hodgson said that the informal public hearings are designed to bring about a full discussion of the proposed standards before holding formal hearings in Washington.

Invitations are being prepared for representatives of building trades unions, industry organizations and governmental agencies to take part in the hearings.

The Labor Dept. said that persons or organizations wanting to attend the hearings or submit statements should notify the director of the Bureau of Labor Standards.

Massachusetts Labor Urges Import Curbs

Boston—The Massachusetts AFL-CIO at its 13th annual convention called on Congress and the Nixon Administration to protect the New England area against plant shutdowns and the continuing loss of jobs to unfair competition from imports.

American workers, the convention said, "face the imminent threat of the loss of thousands of jobs unless the government acts to prevent imports from engulfing the domestic market."

Noting that "many plants in Massachusetts and New England have already closed because of foreign competition and imports," the delegates urged Congress to impose quotas on "such foreign competitive products as textiles, shoes, electronic components and fishery products" unless further negotiations with other countries on controls are successful.

In three days of meetings, the convention made primary election endorsements, updated the State AFL-CIO's constitution and adopted a legislative program at state and national levels.

Convention speakers included Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D), Boston Mayor Kevin White (D) and Gov. Francis W. Sargent (R)—the latter two the winning candidates for governor in the party primaries.

Lettuce Boycott Forced By Court Ban on Pickets

Salinas, Calif.—The United Farm Workers, stripped by local courts of their right to picket peacefully, have only one recourse—to enlist the "support of all justice-loving Americans" for a consumer boycott of non-union lettuce, UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez said here.

"We are trying to build a union. To do this we must picket and we must strike when necessary," Chavez said at a news conference called to announce the start of the lettuce boycott.

"But one by one our rights have been taken away.

"The greatest weapon known to mankind is non-violence. They have taken away our weapon of non-violent picketing and non-violent strikes."

Union-picked produce, as in the case of the grapes, will have the AFL-CIO Farm Workers label on the box, Chavez said.

He cited the barriers thrown against the 7,000 striking union members seeking better wages and conditions in the fields in the Salinas area:

"First, the Teamsters attempted to accomodate the growers and relieve them of any obligation to recognize their workers' union desires by signing back door contracts. This forced our members to strike.

"Second, our right to picket was abridged by violence promoted by growers and local vigilante groups. Then it was whittled further by arrests based on an unconstitutional order issued by a local court," Chavez related.

The order, Chavez said, means that local growers can be "insulated from a legitimate union that represents their workers simply by signing a contract with an outside union that represents none of their workers."

The judge acted in the face of another judge's decision that "clearly outlined the injustice of such an injunction."

"We plan to appeal the injunction but it will take months before it can be repealed," Chavez said, adding "we have ample proof that farm workers are members of UFWOC and want the union to represent them."

The largest lettuce grower in the Salinas area, Inter Harvest, Inc., has signed a contract with the union. Negotiations with two other big lettuce growers, Freshpict Foods, Inc., and Darrigo Bros., broke off and the workers left the fields when the employers insisted on a 10-day recess. That would have left only a few days until the close of the harvest season, the UFWOC said.

Merger Progress Noted At Stereotypers' Parley

San Diego—The Stereotypers at their 67th annual convention moved closer to merger with the Printing Pressmen and also voted to send 18 propositions to a vote of members in a December referendum.

The merger committee reported to the 95 delegates from more than 60 locals that a joint committee of the two unions is preparing a letter of intent to merge. When agreement on terms is reached, the committee has the authority to call for a special convention to adopt a constitution for the merged union.

After that, merger terms will be sent to a membership referendum and will take effect if approved by the IPP and by a two-thirds vote of Stereotyper members, the committee said.

A previous proposal for merger of the Stereotypers with the Lithographers & Photoengravers was approved by majority vote three years ago but failed to get the needed two-thirds.

The convention voted to change the name of the union to International Stereotypers & Electrotypers and Plate Makers.

It defeated a motion authorizing a majority vote instead of a two-thirds vote in any referendum on constitutional questions.

A referendum on election of officers also will be held in December. Candidates will be nominated by local unions at meetings in October. Now finishing two-year terms are Pres. James H. Sampson of Chicago, and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer, New York.

The officers reported their continuing concern with the loss of jobs due to automation and urged redoubled efforts to retrain members to cope with new developments in the graphic arts industry.

Action also is needed, they said, to put the union's mortuary fund on a sound basis. The delegates agreed to a nationwide vote on whether to increase fund assessments by 90 cents a member per month.

Convention speakers included Pres. Alexander J. Rohan of the Pressmen, Vice Pres. Joe Bingel of the Typographical Union, Vice Pres. George Smith of the Bookbinders and Dir. William Robertson of the Los Angeles Herald-Express Strike-Lockout Committee. Rohan, Bingel and Smith all stressed the need for merger to strengthen printing trades unions.

Corporate Profits Show Sharp Jump

After-tax profits of U.S. manufacturing corporations were up 16 percent in the second quarter of 1970, the government reported, reversing a decline for several previous quarters.

The Federal Trade Commission and the Securities & Exchange Commission report showed that profits in the April-June period were up $1.1 billion over the first three months of the year to a total of $8 billion for the quarter.

Profits per dollar of sales in the second quarter were reported at 4.4 cents compared to 4.0 cents for the earlier quarter. The annual rate of profits on stockholders' equity came to 10.4 percent on an after-tax basis compared to 9.2 percent for the January-March period.

Debs Foundation Honors Gorman

Terre Haute, Ind.—The Eugene V. Debs Foundation presented its annual award for outstanding service to labor to Patrick E. Gorman, secretary-treasurer of the Meat Cutters and foundation president since 1962.

The awards dinner was held at the Rose Polytechnic Institute with former Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as principal speaker. Foundation officers chose Gorman, they said, for his "enlightened leadership and labor statesmanship" in the spirit exemplified by Debs, who died in 1926. Debs was a leader of two railroad unions and ran for president on the Socialist Party ticket in 1904, 1908, and 1912.

Incentive Pay Broadened at Republic Steel

Pittsburgh—Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers announced that agreement has been reached on incentive pay coverage for union members employed by the Republic Steel Corp.

Abel said the new settlement extends incentive earnings opportunities for employes to more than the 85 percent minimum coverage ordered by a three-man panel of arbitrators on Aug. 1, 1969.

John S. Johns, director of USWA District 27 and chairman of the union's Republic Steel negotiating committee, said the settlement with that company extends incentive coverage to approximately 5,836 additional workers in 23 plants and brings the total overall coverage up to 30,530 of the 34,804 members employed.

Johns said that retroactive payment of 10 cents an hour covers trade and craft employes, those on maintenance-related jobs, apprentices (after one year of training), mobile equipment employes where the job is production-related, those employed as chemical technicians with melting facilities, and operators of utility facilities.

The President's Role

THE COUNTRY faces a showdown vote next week on whether it is capable of modernizing its method of electing a President of the United States so that one man's vote is worth as much as another's.

As is so often the case in securing legislation, the key vote will be essentially a procedural one on whether the Senate shall wind up debate and vote on the substance of the issue—to amend the U.S. Constitution so that the President is elected by the direct vote of the American people.

A broad coalition of citizen groups, organized labor, employers, educators and political leaders has helped move the bill through the House by an overwhelming vote of 339 to 70.

But the hard core of the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition in the Senate that has for the past three decades worked to block progress and enlightenment has effectively used the filibuster to block simple consideration of the issue.

The key to breaking the filibuster and to whether or not there will be a direct election of the President in 1972 or 1976 is Pres. Nixon. Shortly after his election he expressed his "personal preference" for the direct election plan but expressed doubts that such a plan could be adopted.

When the House approved the direct election amendment the President said he would support the bill in the Senate. But this support has been perfunctory at best.

In his message to Congress earlier this month he said that the amendment would be "a touchstone of the impulse to reform in America today," that "time is running out" and finally that "it is still possible to pass the measure and to amend the Constitution in time for the 1972 elections."

If the President wants action there are a number of Republican senators who control the result of both the filibuster and the electoral reform issue. A strong plea from the White House, an urgent call by the President for votes and public support could, in his words, "measure our ability to avert calamity by anticipating it."

The Quest

ALTHOUGH WE HAVE reservations about using song titles for editorials, we find ourselves in complete agreement with the Wall Street Journal's recent comments on the tax system under the title "An Impossible Dream."

The Journal, taking note of AFL-CIO opposition to the Nixon Administration's tax proposals including a tax on lead additives in gasoline, says:

"The tax system is twisted enough to raise doubt about using it to attack air pollution."

We agree and would cite the greatest twisting and distortion of all—the treatment of capital-gains and the heavy preference given unearned income as against the wages and salaries of working people. To paraphrase the Journal, the tax system in its present form is twisted enough to raise doubt about using it to achieve tax justice.

Or perhaps that too is an impossible dream; except that it is better to have a go at the tax system than never to have tried at all.

'Don't Just Stand There–Help!'

A Word Edgewise:

Flunkies Should Be First to Go In Educational Budget Crisis

A FASCINATING SUBJECT for careful analysis—which may be under way without my being aware of it—is the budgetary shift that has taken place in American education over the last 20 years. While schools and colleges have yet to match the U.S. Army's talent for growing a tail, an incredible amount of money seems to be budgeted these days for "educational infrastructure," that is, for activities that a skeptic might consider only remotely significant to teaching the young.

For every rifleman in Viet Nam, there are about eight men in the "tail." Some (e.g., helicopter mechanics, supply sergeants, etc.) are obviously necessary, but others merely clutter up the PX. Public relations officers always reacted bitterly when I made this observation, and turned up with elaborate briefing books to prove that every man assigned to the military was an essential cog in the great machine. They reacted even more negatively when I suggested that we could begin by sending all public relations officers home.

Now we seem to have much the same sort of proliferation of flunkies in American education. Recently the papers have run stories about the $11 million deficit at Columbia, the $2 million one at Yale, and similar evidence that even our strongest private institutions are having financial problems. When such a crisis occurs, the inevitable (and necessary) response is a freeze in appointments; Yale is leaving 100 previously budgeted slots unfilled.

However, the question that interests me is what percentage of the money spent by colleges and universities these days actually goes to the "teeth," to the academic riflemen, the instructional staff. A while ago a friend, who recently resigned as a top administrator in one of our leading universities, told me that over half the funds in his budget went to administrative, research, and non-classroom activities of varying sorts. (We are talking of the operating, not the capital budget.)

One can suspect this to be true of other major institutions both state and privately sponsored.

The reason for it is simple: since the end of the Korean War higher education has been surfing on waves of money. For almost 20 years, a distinguished university could obtain funding for just about anything. Innovation proceeded in spurts of mimicry: if one university set up a Chinese Studies Center or an Institute of Molecular Biology or a dynamic interdisciplinary curriculum, every other school in the league wanted one for its status collection.

The scenario invariably developed along these lines: an academic entrepreneur would persuade a foundation to put up the "seed money" to float the center for its first five years. Faculty and staff would be accumulated, a donor would provide a building (buildings are easy to get), and the operation would go on its merry way. For five years—then suddenly the university must choose between firing all hands or picking up the tab itself. The notion of firing anybody is almost as repugnant in the academic world as it is in business and government circles. Usually the university picks up the tab.

THIS IS AN interesting tab. Much of it will be salaries for staff who hold academic appointments but are not integrated into the teaching functions of the university. Often they might as well be on the moon; they seldom teach undergraduates and many honor the university by contributing their names to the catalogue rather than by active labor.

There is nothing un-American about this, but it is a real luxury item. And, when the liquid cash runs short, a school can find itself with a spectacular set of expensive educational satellites flashing by overhead—and no money to pay instructors of freshman English.

My advice to university presidents, then, is slash the tail. Close down the cosmetic baronies, pull out the phones, and above all decimate the spear carriers, the clutches of assistant deans, psychological counselors, career advisers, secretaries, and other assorted camp followers. Put the money into the "teeth"—into teaching. It may be radical doctrine, but I insist a university is an educational institution, not an intellectual welfare program.

Blue-Collar Youths Seeking Their Own Status in Society

OF THE 45 MILLION young Americans between the ages of 15 and 29, roughly 21 million of them are neither students nor college graduates. Diffused throughout the work force, they constitute about one-fourth of the trade union membership. They tend to be more suburbanized than older workers. They feel the squeeze of an unequal tax burden and of astronomical interest rates that make it hard to finance a home and start a family.

These young workers have been tabbed the "Invisible Youth," because until recently nobody was paying much attention to them. But they have now aroused a new interest—indeed the entire working class is in the process of being "rediscovered" by liberal intellectuals. No complete picture of the young worker is yet available, but some sketchy features are beginning to emerge.

For one thing, he seems more restless on the job than older workers. He is better educated and resents being talked down to or ordered around by the boss. Having entered the labor market during the 1960s, when the employment rate stayed fairly high, he is less timid in presenting his grievances than older workers who remember the Great Depression of the 1930s or the recessions of the 1950s.

It is not only on the job that the younger worker is restless or resentful. He is bombarded with the prepackaged dreams of television commercials and beckoned to share vicariously in the swinging adventures and comic antics of the affluent. He sees some of his contemporaries, the sons and daughters of the well-to-do, tear up their campuses with an abandon that only the economically carefree can afford. He watches as they dominate the media with a hairy "cultural revolution" which has nothing whatever to do with him, except possibly to violate some of his deepest moral, social or religious codes.

Three sociologists, William Simon, John H. Gagnon and Donald Carns, have put it in different language: "Now, as the post-industrial society advances the changes, the possibilities for working-class youth to recognize themselves in the emerging images of man have significantly lessened. . . . Part of the problem has been the failure of . . . intellectuals even to begin to recognize this population."

And even though these intellectuals consider themselves anti-establishment, the sociologists say that "for working-class populations, particularly the young, these anti-establishment groups have become the establishment, at least to the degree that they set the tone for the surface imagery of our times. . . . Thus [the young worker] too becomes anti-establishment, but for him it is a liberal establishment and before it he feels increasingly powerless."

In analyzing the appeal of the Wallace movement to young workers, Professor Seymour Lipset of Harvard argues that ". . . what the movement gave voice to was not merely racism but backlash, which can be defined as an attempt on the part of a disaffected segment of the population to recover a status which seems to be slipping away. Indeed, all right-wing extremist movements throughout American history have arisen against the background of economic and social changes which resulted in the displacement of some population groups. . . . But, by and large, it is not racism or ethnic bigotry that creates backlash political movements; rather, it is the backlash against displacement. . . ." This is a useful thought in these times, when the term "white racism" is bandied about so lightly.

Of course, one hastens to point out that the great majority of workers, young and old, rejected the Wallace movement and instead supported Hubert Humphrey, whose civil rights record is unexcelled. Still, the fact that a larger proportion of younger workers than older workers supported Wallace suggests that the youngsters are experiencing pressures and problems to which they feel the larger society is not responding.

THOSE THINKERS for whom the phrase "generation gap" magically explains all problems will see the anti-establishment feelings of young workers and middle-class radical students as pretty much the same phenomenon. And they are, but only in the sense that both groups are part of a rapidly changing society—which really doesn't tell us very much.

The fact is that the two groups are on a collision course—heading toward what Lipset aptly calls "a clash of contemporaries." Remember the national guardsmen at Kent State were about the same age as the students they fired on; and the most vigorous advocates of a get-tough policy among policemen are the younger men.

In this, the richest society in the world, with vast productive powers yet untapped, all of our youth have a rightful claim to the best possible education, to rewarding work, to an income that furnishes the necessities and amenities of the good life, to a wholesome environment, to freedom from all forms of racial and class prejudice, to full expression and participation in a democratic society.

These claims are not only compatible; they cannot be met independently of one another.

What is needed to meet these claims is a far-reaching program that will move students and workers, young and old, black and white much closer to social and economic equality—a program toward which the American labor movement has already made far and away the most significant contribution of any institution in American life.

And finally we need to rally support for that program, not just from a militant minority, but from the determined majority whose needs it answers.

Opportunity for Advancement:

Trade Union Apprenticeships Held Best Route to Job Skills

APPRENTICESHIP is the best and surest way for young workers to enter the construction industry, where there is good opportunity for "upward mobility," two AFL-CIO manpower experts declared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

"Institutionized training" such as vocational education just doesn't give young workers the job skills and understanding of the construction industry needed to be a fully-rounded journeyman, said Julius Rothman, president of the Human Resources Development Institute, and Robert McGlotten, executive director of the non-profit organization created by the AFL-CIO.

Young workers often spend three years in vocational school training for carpentry or sheet metal work, learning little beyond "how to sand bookends" or assemble ashtrays, skills unrelated to actual construction work, McGlotten asserted. He stressed that the actual on-site experience of apprenticeship gives the young worker both the necessary job-skills and the chance to "become familiar with the nature" of the industry in which he will be working.

Rothman said that the HRDI, now in its third year of operation, is stepping up its emphasis on upgrading the skills of workers already in jobs, "especially those who have been brought onto jobs within the last couple of years." He said that with unemployment rising and with funds now available for such training through the JOBS program (Job Opportunities in the Business Sector), employers may be more "willing to take advantage of upgrading their existing work-force."

McGlotten and Rothman said that HRDI is now working with the Departments of Defense and Labor to develop a job-training and placement program for returning servicemen. "These young men deserve every kind of assistance they can get, and the AFL-CIO and the HRDI are committed" to helping them, they declared.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ON THE BUMPERS of automobiles in the District of Columbia are stickers that read: "D. C.—The Last Colony."

The bill recently passed by the Congress and signed by the President to give the District a non-voting delegate in the House of Representatives doesn't change this—Washington citizens are still denied home rule, having lost the right to self-government in 1874.

In addition to the non-voting delegate, however, extremely limited suffrage has been given District residents in two other areas in recent years:

● In 1960 Congress passed the 23rd Amendment to the Constitution which provided for the right to vote for President and Vice President. It became a part of the Constitution the following year when Kansas became the 38th state to ratify it.

● In 1968, Congress approved and Pres. Johnson signed into law a measure which provided for the election of an 11-member school board in the District. Prior to that, federal judges appointed school board members.

With these exceptions, citizens of the District continue to be denied the right to elect their own public officials. They have no voice in local taxes, housing, highways, welfare, public services and other vital community programs.

According to the 1970 census, the District of Columbia has a population of 764,000. Preliminary census figures show that 10 of the 50 states in the union have a smaller population.

IT'S HARD TO IMAGINE a more impossible form of city government than that imposed on the District. It has a commissioner (or mayor) appointed by the President and a city council, also named by the President.

Both the legislative and fiscal responsibility for the District rests with Congress. There are four congressional committees that spend all or part of their time on District affairs.

The ultimate power rests with the 435 members of the House and the 100 members of the Senate who, in a sense, are a "city council." And since not a single member of Congress looks upon the citizens of the District as his constituents, the District's population has no real leverage to secure representation.

Home rule for the District has not even been a partisan issue. It has been endorsed by Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson and now Nixon.

The real problem arises in the House District Committee which has long been dominated by southern conservatives who are determined to resist home rule efforts. Its chairman and spiritual leader is Rep. John L. McMillan (D-S.C.).

The committee never gave the full House the opportunity to vote on the home rule until the 89th Congress. Then, in some fancy parliamentary maneuvering, the committee refused to authorize a conference with the Senate, which had already approved home rule. It killed the brightest hope for home rule to date.

In 1967, Pres. Johnson did win a right to reorganize the District government so that if home rule ever came the structure would ease the transition.

Many strong proponents of home rule were reluctant to support the recent proposal for a non-voting delegate to the House. They believed it would take much steam out of the drive for home rule.

However, both Hawaii and Alaska were represented by non-voting delegates prior to achieving statehood.

Supporters of home rule for the District are clinging to the hope that the action by Congress in providing the non-voting delegate will be a significant step toward self-government for the District of Columbia.

THE BEST AND SUREST way to the "upward mobility" opportunities in the construction industry is through the apprenticeship system, Executive Dir. Robert McGlotten of the Human Resources Development Institute and Institute Pres. Julius Rothman, center, told reporters Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Wurf Asks End To Exclusions Of Wage Law

About 3 million state, county and city workers are excluded from the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act who ought to be protected, Congress was told by Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Wurf, in testimony before a House Labor subcommittee, also called for "a single minimum wage of at least $2 an hour for all American workers by Feb. 1, 1972."

He further proposed elimination of all overtime exemptions and the setting of double-time pay for all overtime.

Wurf told the subcommittee that only a few of his union's 500,000 members would benefit by the proposed amendments since the majority of SCME members enjoy wage standards equal to or higher than the proposed minimums. Therefore, he said, he spoke on behalf of the approximately 3 million state, county and municipal employes who are covered neither by FLSA nor by collective bargaining agreements.

Until 1966 no public employes were covered by FLSA, Wurf pointed out. That year Congress enacted labor-supported amendments extending coverage to more than 1.5 million workers in public schools, hospitals and nursing homes. Twenty-eight states tried to block enforcement of this enlarged coverage but were defeated by a Supreme Court ruling.

PROBLEMS of the American film industry are discussed in San Francisco by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany with Pres. Charlton Heston of the Screen Actors Guild.

Texas Labor Endorses Full Democratic Slate

Dallas—The Texas State AFL-CIO urged "support for statewide candidates of the Democratic Party" at a meeting of the federation's executive board and COPE Administrative Committee here.

The resolution of support included by implication Lloyd Bentsen, Jr., but did not name him. Bentsen defeated Sen. Ralph Yarborough, Democratic chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, in the primary election last spring. He faces Republican Rep. George Bush of Houston in the general election.

Adoption of the resolution came after an hour and a half of debate over the inclusion of Bentsen in the recommendation. During the debate, State AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown said, "Unionists ought not fall out over any politicians."

After a motion to eliminate the blanket-support statement was defeated, the resolution supporting all Democratic candidates was adopted without dissent.

One of the arguments for support of the blanket resolution was the state Democratic Party's platform. It includes 15 points that concur with positions in the State AFL-CIO legislative platform. Among them are an increase in the state minimum wage law, voter registration reform, higher workmen's compensation benefits, expansion of coverage of the unemployment insurance law, auto insurance reforms and a state public utilities commission.

For the first time in 20 years, neither Texas political party included support of "right-to-work" laws in its platform.

The resolution of support for Democrats said:

"In the last several years the Democratic-led legislature has shown signs of turning in a new direction. And at nearly all levels of state government under Democratic officeholders there seems to be a new awareness of the need for change and a willingness to try to cooperate with all groups, including organized labor.

"While at the same time on the national level our government seems to have turned in the opposite direction—away from facing problems and away from cooperation in an effort to seek solutions.

"The National Republican Administration has simply failed to create an atmosphere of working together to achieve a stable economy and social climate."

The State AFL-CIO executive board also approved:

- Continued participation in the National COPE's data processing system.
- Continued financial assistance for the United Farm Workers' activities in Texas.
- Support for the Auto Workers in the General Motors strike.
- Development of a program for processing workmen's compensation cases for members of affiliated local unions.
- Financial assistance to the Corpus Christi AFL-CIO to support its disaster relief program in the wake of Hurricane Celia.

URW Settles Walkout, Mohawk Plant Reopens

West Helena, Ark.—The Rubber Workers and Mohawk Rubber Co. reached an agreement here that ended a 12-week strike and rescinded a plant-shutdown decision by the company.

Negotiators headed by URW Pres. Peter Bommarito and Mohawk Vice Pres. J. W. Keener, Jr., agreed that both parties to the agreement want to restore the plant to profitable operations and will do all in their power to achieve that goal.

The strike began June 8 when the old contract expired. Management closed the plant Aug. 15, and later made an offer that union members voted to accept. The company started to reactivate the tire plant shortly afterward.

Under the new terms, the company gave production and maintenance employes an immediate wage boost of 30 cents an hour and an additional 15 cents an hour to skilled tradesmen.

Effective next Nov. 1, pension benefits will be raised from $3.25 a month for each year of service to $7.75. Disability pensions will rise from $6.50 a month per year of service to $15.50. Retiree pensions have been raised by $1.25 per month times years of service.

Sickness and accident benefits were increased to $85 a week for up to 52 weeks from the previous top of $60 per week for a maximum of 39 weeks.

Other changes improve life insurance and supplemental unemployment benefits. Employes will get an additional paid holiday, and improved funeral leave and vacation provisions.

The company and the union set up a joint study committee to meet quarterly to "discuss, explore and study" suggestions for the mutual solution of plant problems.

URW members agreed not to engage in work stoppages, slowdowns or overtime bans, and management will improve its method of scheduling overtime and filling vacancies due to absenteeism.

Bommarito and Keener said the settlement recognizes that each party has a responsibility to the other and that "the new contract will work to the benefit of both parties if each strives to make it work."

Under the new terms, management has the right to notify the union in the latter half of June 1971 that it intends to close the plant if it becomes unprofitable. Otherwise the contract will continue in effect to June 8, 1973.

In such a case, an additional wage hike of 26 cents an hour will be payable Aug. 30, 1971, and 26 more cents an hour on Aug. 28, 1972. Skilled trades employes will get an additional 10 cents an hour on Aug. 31, 1971. Management will also provide a drug purchase plan for all employes and their dependents on Nov. 1, 1971.

Mohawk announced plans to raise the number of bargaining unit employes to about 380, depending on plant operations and general industry conditions.

N.Y. Convention to Reconvene Oct. 14

New York — The New York State AFL-CIO will resume its 1970 convention Oct. 14 at Kiamesha Lake, N.Y. The convention was recessed Sept. 4 after endorsing Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller for re-election.

Pres. Raymond P. Corbett said the first order of business will be a motion to reconsider the endorsement of Rockefeller over Democratic-Liberal challenger Arthur J. Goldberg, the former Supreme Court justice.

Also on the agenda for the reconvened session will be the biennial election of officers and action on committee reports and resolutions.

Direct Election Vote Stalled:

Senate Approves Auto Pollution Bill

The Senate passed a strong, labor-supported air pollution control bill, but a filibuster continued to block action on a constitutional amendment for direct election of the President.

Another attempt to muster a two-thirds vote to limit debate on the direct election amendment was scheduled as a southern-led conservative coalition again refused to allow the amendment to be brought to a showdown vote.

Its chief sponsor, Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), warned filibuster supporters that he would start using his parliamentary right to keep the Senate from carrying on business as usual until the constitutional amendment is disposed of. For two weeks, the Senate has been setting aside the amendment after brief debate to take up other bills.

Passage of the air pollution bill without weakening amendments was a major victory for Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) and a setback to auto industry lobbyists who fought in vain against a mandatory deadline for a pollution-free automobile engine.

The Senate bill sets a deadline of 1975 for elimination of 90 percent of the present auto exhaust pollution, with a maximum one-year grace period if the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare recommends it and federal courts concur.

The Senate voted 73-0 for the Muskie bill, and the industry lobbyists are expected to shift their efforts to a House-Senate conference committee.

A House-passed bill, based on Administration recommendations, sets a "goal" of 1980 for elimination of auto pollution, but does not require that the goal be met. It leaves auto exhaust standards up to the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

The Senate bill also calls for federal air quality standards, requires new factories to be built with the latest antipollution controls, and prohibits any emissions of a list of pollutants found to present a severe health hazard. It also provides more than double the money authorized in the House bill to carry out the program.

One of the bill's major accomplishments, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said, is the nationwide pollution standards "stopping the industrial blackmail to which workers are subjected by industries which threaten to leave or do leave states or areas with tough antipollution programs."

IUE Challenges National Guard Employe Rules

The Electrical Radio & Machine Workers filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia challenging the constitutionality of a federal law requiring technicians employed by the Army and Air Force National Guard to belong to the Guard and be subject to military regulations and discipline. This includes wearing of uniforms while performing their civilian duties.

The suit, on behalf of four New Jersey local unions, contends that the National Guard Technicians Act of 1968 violates the 5th and 14th Amendments.

The union contends the act deprives the technicians of rights granted other government employes and, by subjecting them to state power and jurisdiction exercised through Guard adjutants general, deprives them of equal protection under the law.

The class action suit seeks relief for some 500 IUE-represented civilian employes of the New Jersey Army and Air Force National Guard, as well as for all civilian technicians employed by the Guard throughout the United States. The total number of such workers is over 40,000.

Union-Busting Congress Goal of 'R-T-W' Group

The National Right to Work Committee, largely financed by anti-union employers and other ultra-conservatives, is questioning all nominees for the Senate and House to find out where they stand on legislation designed to weaken and cripple unions.

Its letter to the candidates says: "The calendar year 1971 will bring the introduction on Capitol Hill of bills relating to the use of compulsory union dues and fees for partisan political purposes, the forced unionization of employes in the private and public sectors—including agricultural workers, and the authority of states to outlaw the firing of qualified workers simply because they refuse to pay dues or fees to labor organizations."

It then sets forth five politically-slanted questions and asks the nominees for a yes or no answer:

"Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act reaffirms the authority of states to prohibit compulsory unionism by enacting right-to-work laws. Do you favor retention of Section 14(b)?

"Federal policy affecting employes of the federal government—as reflected by executive orders issued by Presidents Kennedy and Nixon and also by the recently enacted Postal Reform law—forbids compulsory unionism. Will you vote for proposed legislation which would reinforce the right of citizens to work for the federal government whether or not they pay dues or fees to labor unions?

"Will you, as a member of the Congress, support legislation which would effectively prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for any kind of partisan political activity?

"Present federal policy encourages the forced unionization of workers in the private sector. Employes are deprived by law of their right of choice 'to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment. . . .' Do you favor continuation of this federal policy?

"Next year the Congress is expected to consider legislation granting new privileges to union organizers of farm workers. Will you oppose a provision which would authorize the firing of farm workers for their refusal to pay union dues or fees?"

Real Earnings Lag As Prices Edge Up

the past three months was reflected in all three major components: food, other commodities and services.

The Nixon Administration hailed the August CPI report as evidence that its economic policies are succeeding in the fight against inflation.

But Joel Popkin, assistant commissioner of the BLS, declined to predict whether future months would bring further improvements or a worsening of inflation.

In a companion report, the BLS said gross weekly earnings for production and non-supervisory workers averaged $122.15 in August, an increase of 70 cents from July. The bureau attributed the month-to month advance to a one-tenth of 1 hour increase in the workweek and a 1-cent rise in average hourly earnings.

After adjustment for price increases, the 70-cent gain was cut to 32 cents. While this is a boost of four-tenths of 1 percent from July, it is nine-tenths of 1 percent below the level of August 1969.

The July-to-August gains in gross earnings occurred among workers in mining, construction and finance to offset small declines for workers in manufacturing, services and transportation and public utilities.

Leading the increase in the CPI was an advance of six-tenths of 1 percent in consumer services, including housing costs and medical care.

Mortgage interest charges rose significantly in August, BLS said, mainly because of higher house prices. Transportation costs declined six-tenths of 1 percent from July due primarily to lower prices of gasoline and used cars.

Food prices rose one-tenth of 1 percent last month, less than usual for that time of year, resulting in a one-tenth of 1 percent decline after seasonal adjustments.

But clothing, which usually declines in August, rose one-tenth of 1 percent.

Because of the rise in the index, about 146,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay increases, the BLS noted. Based on changes in the index since August 1969, nearly 100,000 workers mainly in aerospace will get an 8-cent hourly raise and another 18,400 will receive 4 cents an hour more.

Three cents an hour more will be paid to 18,000 employes, mainly in chemical and machinery industries, based on the advance in the index since last May.

About 31,000 workers whose cost of living escalators are tied to the August index will not receive adjustments because they have already received the maximum amount stipulated in their contracts, the BLS said.

Nixon Moves To Give NLRB GOP Majority

Pres. Nixon has nominated Ralph E. Kennedy to the National Labor Relations Board to replace Frank W. McCulloch, former NLRB chairman who was not reappointed when his term expired last month.

Kennedy, 50, is a Republican who has been a career staff employe of the NLRB since 1948. He is currently the labor board's regional director at Los Angeles.

The appointment, if confirmed by the Senate, will give the NLRB its first Republican majority in 10 years.

NLRB members serve staggered four-year terms and the first opportunity the Administration had to make an appointment came when the term of Sam Zagoria expired last year. Zagoria, a liberal Republican, was not reappointed. Nixon named Edward B. Miller, a management lawyer, to replace him and to serve as NLRB chairman.

NON-ACADEMIC PROGRAMS to help labor unions increase their stake in community activities are discussed by Pres. Winthrop C. Libby of the University of Maine at the opening session of a labor institute sponsored by the Maine State AFL-CIO. The three-day institute at Orono, Me., was directed by George T. Guernsey of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Pilots Urge Security Measures To Keep Hijackers from Planes

Security measures to prevent hijackers from boarding airplanes must receive major emphasis among steps being taken to halt air piracy, the Air Line Pilots told Congress.

ALPA Pres. Charles Ruby and Dwight Dedmon, safety director of the union's Stewards & Stewardesses Association, expressed some reservations about Pres. Nixon's decision to put armed federal guards aboard passenger planes.

Both stressed in testimony before the House Foreign Affairs committee that they aren't opposed to the action, but they urged limitations on the use of guards. Their effectiveness, ALPA said, will depend upon the quality of their training and their judgment.

Ruby said the main danger from the use of guards isn't centered on the chance that bullet holes in the skin of an airline might cause pressurized cabins to explode as has been widely suggested. Airplane design, he noted, is such as to prevent tearing over a wide area. A bullet hole would cause a deafening noise but no dangerous lack of oxygen, he said.

The pilots' concern with the presence of guards aboard planes, Ruby told the lawmakers, is that it greatly increases the risk of injury or death to passengers from possible "shootouts" high in the skies.

He warned against having pilots arm themselves, as some have suggested. The layout of the cockpit and the airplane would not allow them to act against hijackers with effectiveness and would endanger passengers and the plane itself, Ruby said.

Dedmon feared a more perilous resort to the use of explosives by hijackers if there is an overdependence on guards aboard planes to the sacrifice of measures to prevent hijackers from boarding planes.

The Administration has announced as part of its anti-hijacking program the increased use of federal marshals to patrol airports and the improvement and expansion of weapons detection systems at boarding gates, proposals previously urged by the airlines' unions.

Meanwhile, the 27-nation executive council of the International Civil Aviation Organization meeting in Montreal received a plea from the United States and Canada to institute a boycott of air service to nations harboring or failing to punish hijackers.

Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe, presenting the proposal for the United States, said "We are not foreclosing any type of unilateral action on our part if we do not see any sign of firm action by the international aviation community."

In another development, Charles H. Blyth, general secretary of the International Transport Workers Federation (ITF) and President Ola Forsberg of the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Assocations (IFALPA) announced their organizations would coordinate their activities against hijacking.

The hijacking problem is a top item on the agenda for an International Civil Aviation Conference, sponsored by the ITF, which opens Sept. 28 in Miami Beach.

Marland Termed Unfit For Key Education Post

for a share of the education dollar."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had unanimously urged Pres. Nixon not to appoint Marland to the nation's top education post and Meany said it is "unfortunate" that the President has done so.

Marland has been president of the industry-linked Institute for Educational Development since 1968—when he resigned as Pittsburgh's school superintendent after the American Federation of Teachers won a collective bargaining election.

In earlier posts in Connecticut and Illinois, as well as in Pittsburgh, Meany charged, "Dr. Marland took an uncompromising position against unions for teachers."

At Pittsburgh, Meany noted, Marland had opposed both the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association "with blunt impartiality," holding to a declared policy of "no bargaining and no negotiating."

In a televised address to Pittsburgh teachers, Marland declared, "I do not intend to be a party to the swift decline of teachers' freedom into collectivism."

Meany termed Marland's link to the industries seeking to sell products and services to school systems "even more alarming" than his expressed anti-union views.

One study conducted by Marland's "non-profit research and development firm" reported with enthusiasm the arrangement by which a "management expert" was loaned to the New Haven school system for full-time service while remaining on the payroll of the Olin-Mathieson Chemical Corp.

Meany noted that as recently as last spring, Marland urged Congress to enact federal anti-strike legislation for teachers.

His statement to a House Education & Labor subcommittee suggested that "student rebellion . . . vandalism . . . obscenity" might be linked to the poor example of teachers who have struck in defiance of no-strike laws. And even though better pay and working conditions for teachers may have been "long overdue and justified," the outcome, Marland complained, is that "public funds have been diverted to teacher benefits as against other school needs."

The post of U.S. Commissioner of Education has been vacant since last June, when Dr. James E. Allen, Jr., was fired after policy disagreements with the White House.

- Institute for Building Trades Business Agents, Nov. 30-Dec. 4.

Cleveland Drive Adds 44,000 Voters in a Day

Cleveland—Thanks to the trade union movement's volunteer womenpower, a record 44,000 new voters were enrolled and 11,500 voter address changes processed in target precincts during a single neighborhood registration day.

For 10 days prior to the registration, the 75-woman volunteer crew made 11,000 phone calls, recruited 3,000 volunteers who agreed to make personal visits to unregistered union members in their neighborhoods, mailed tens of thousands of registration reminder postcards and distributed 41,000 door-hanger reminders.

The volunteers included members of COPE's Women's Activities Dept., wives and daughters of union members and members of the Communications Workers.

The operation was conceived by the Ohio State AFL-CIO and carried out with an all-out effort of the Cleveland central body.

Target precincts were selected with the help of computerized identification of precincts having 12 or more unregistered union members.

The number of new voters added to the rolls was more than double the comparable figure for 1966, when there was no concentrated labor registration drive.

When the totals were in, labor's political analysts found impressive precinct-by-precinct evidence of the effectiveness of the effort.

For example, one of Cleveland's "silk stocking" districts, with few union members, had traditionally produced twice as many registrations as a workingmen's neighborhood with a larger population.

This year, the ratio was exactly reversed.

The Ohio and Cleveland central bodies are already planning a similar concentrated drive to get out the vote on Election Day.

Michael Fitzpatrick Dies, Retired IUE Leader

Deltona, Fla. — Michael Fitzpatrick, union pioneer in the electrical manufacturing industry, died here at 76. Burial was in East McKeesport, Pa.

Fitzpatrick helped organize the Pittsburgh Westinghouse plant in the 1940s and played a major role in bringing most of the Westinghouse chain into the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Before his retirement, he served as national chairman of the IUE Westinghouse Conference Board, as administrator of IUE District 6, and as a vice president of the Pennsylvania State CIO Council.

Survivors include a son Thomas, an area director for the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Stresses Full Labor Support:

Meany Cites Urgent Need For Health Insurance Plan

and by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and numerous co-sponsors.

But he warned against a "medicredit" bill backed by the American Medical Association as "legislative quackery designed to salvage as much of the old order as possible, and to do as little as possible about providing health care for all."

The Senate committee also heard strong support for national health insurance from Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who testified as chairman of the Health Security Action Council.

Woodcock said he had come to Washington despite the pressures of the General Motors strike because the health care bill is "vital to our members and to all working people." Private medical insurance, Woodcock said, has proved costly, wasteful and inadequate.

Meany, in his testimony, noted that the labor movement is no Johnny-come-lately to the crusade for national health insurance.

Back in the early 1940s, it supported the comprehensive Wagner-Murray-Dingell health care bill and the AFL-CIO's present legislative director, Andrew J. Biemiller, was an early co-sponsor of the legislation during his service in Congress.

Over the years, he said, labor "supported every legislative step that has moved in the direction of that goal," including Medicare and Medicaid, "which brought medical care for the sick who also happen to be very poor or very old."

Meany termed those victories "important gains, won in the face of bitter and relentless opposition."

But he stressed that "in the larger context of the health and well-being of the nation as a whole, they were only preliminary skirmishes."

Americans spend more money than the people of any other nation on health care, but "by nearly every measure of human health, America lags behind" other western nations. "We have been slipping down the ladder for two decades, and every year the figures get worse."

The inevitable conclusion is "there must be something wrong with the system by which medical care is delivered," Meany said.

He told the committee that "American workers and their unions believe there is a great deal wrong with it, and they are very unhappy with the result."

The AFL-CIO represents "a cross-section of America," Meany reminded the committee.

"They are of all races and creeds and they live in the suburbs, in the central cities and, in more cases than many believe, in rural areas. One thing all of our members have in common, regardless of their wages and salaries, is a deep concern about the health of their family, the high costs of medical care, and the problems often encountered of finding adequate medical care, especially in emergency situations."

Meany restated labor's goals for a national health insurance program, including:

- Full coverage for "every man, woman and child in the nation."
- Comprehensive benefits, "including preventive, outpatient, inpatient and rehabilitative care."
- Financing "like social security with payments by employes at about the present scheduled Medicare rate, with the federal government and employers splitting the remaining payroll costs."
- Contracting for all medical services on a prepayment basis with groups of physicians and medical and dental societies.
- Free choice of physicians and of health delivery systems.
- Financial assistance for development of comprehensive health care systems.

The AFL-CIO's endorsement of the Griffiths bill early this year also applies to the legislation introduced by Yarborough, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Sen. John S. Cooper (R-Ky.), Sen. William B. Saxbe (R-Ohio) and other co-sponsors.

Both "in their basic approach and fundamental philosophy," Meany noted, the House and Senate bills "are very close." He suggested that "by combining the best provisions of both, an even better bill than either could be enacted in the next Congress."

A superior feature of the Griffiths bill, Meany suggested, is its proposal to contract for health services with medical groups on the basis of "a fixed amount per month for the family's total health care." And the Senate bill, he noted, "adds a very important feature by allocating substantial funds for the rapid development of prepaid group practice and for increasing the supply of physicians and other health professions."

As for the AMA "medicredit" proposal, Meany termed it "no more than an appeal for federal subsidies of the existing system, as if there were nothing wrong that couldn't be cured by putting more money in the hands of the AMA's constituents."

It is a step forward for the AMA, Meany commented, only in that it marks a break "with the AMA's bitter opposition to any suggestion that the nation's health is a national concern." And "it does for the first time advocate federal funding of health services" since "money derived from tax credits is, after all, tax money."

In response to questions, Meany and AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman stressed that the cost of national health insurance would be substantially less than the cost of the present inefficient, inadequate methods of providing medical care.

Meany termed passage of national health insurance "inevitable" because it is the "only answer." The "cost of being sick," he said, has risen to the point that "it's almost impossible for the average citizen to bear."

The same groups that are fighting national health insurance, he reminded the committee, fought every type of social legislation dating back to the first workmen's compensation laws and predicted "calamity and catastrophe" when Congress was considering the original social security and wage-hour laws and during every proposed improvement since then.

'Say Aye!'

Senate Approves Plan For Public Service Jobs

to establish and develop their own manpower services programs, subject to federal standards.

The Administration had proposed turning the bulk of manpower funds over to the states, but the Senate insisted on including direct grants to cities and metropolitan areas of over 75,000 population.

The bill authorizes multi-billion dollar appropriations, rising to a peak of $3 billion in fiscal year 1974 for the basic manpower program and $1.5 billion for the public service portion.

Regardless of the amount appropriated, however, one-third of the money available would be reserved for public service employment programs.

The Senate rejected, 55-19, an Administration-supported amendment by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) which would have eliminated the requirement that one-third of the funds be allocated to public service employment. It would have left the disposition of the money up to the Secretary of Labor.

It also turned down, 46-28, another Dominick amendment to give governors review power over manpower programs submitted by mayors. And Dominick abandoned a list of other Administration-requested amendments after the Senate voted 43-29 against curtailing the public service employment program and limiting wages to 80 percent of the rate paid for comparable jobs not receiving federal subsidies.

Under the Senate bill, public service workers would be guaranteed either the prevailing area rate for their jobs or the federal minimum wage, whichever was higher.

The Senate-passed bill provides much of the decentralization and flexibility of funding that the Administration had requested. However it mandates continuation of a number of existing programs, such as New Careers, which opens up advancement opportunities for low-paid workers, Mainstream to bring hard-core unemployed into the labor force, the Neighborhood Youth Corps and Community Environment Service. The Secretary of Labor would be able to shift funds from one program to another.

Companion legislation is awaiting action in the House Labor Committee.

Long-Stalled Job Health-Safety Bill Cleared by House Rules Committee

A long-stalled, desperately-needed occupational health and safety bill finally got a green light from the House Rules Committee, setting the stage for a major floor battle.

The labor-supported measure will go to the House floor under what is known as an "open rule"—allowing amendments of any part of the bill and consideration of complete substitute legislation, as well as a final up-or-down vote.

Under the labor-supported bill authored by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and approved by the House Labor Committee, the Secretary of Labor would be empowered to issue job safety and health standards, inspect workplaces to see that the standards are being met, order violations to be corrected subject to court enforcement, and under extreme conditions of "imminent danger" shut down a plant.

Standards would be recommended by advisory committees including management, labor and professional experts.

The AFL-CIO, the federation's Industrial Union Dept. and scores of affiliated unions have made passage of a strong job safety and health law a high priority legislative goal. The Daniels bill has been bitterly fought by employer organizations. But it has been recommended by major health groups, including the National Tuberculosis & Respiratory Disease Association.

The TB Christmas Seal group, in a letter to its local units, said "a strong nationally-administered occupational safety and health program is essential to reduce the toll of disability and wastage of human life."

If a congressional reform bill approved by the House on a 326-19 vote was already law, union members and others interested in the job health and safety bill would be able to find out exactly how their congressmen voted on key amendments.

Under present procedures, most amendments are approved or rejected by "teller vote." House members—sometimes only a handful are present—walk by tellers who count them but do not record their names.

One labor-supported provision of the reform bill provides for the recording of the names of House members voting for or against an amendment.

The bill also directs that rollcall votes taken in committees—where legislation is written—be made public. And it limits proxy voting in committees to cases where the absent member has given specific instructions to the person who holds his proxy.

The legislation now goes to a House-Senate conference committee, which is expected to deal only with issues affecting both houses.

Once again, the House bowed to the private power lobby and insisted on deleting funds the Senate had voted to continue preconstruction planning for the Dickey-Lincoln School hydro-electric power project in Maine.

The AFL-CIO strongly urged that the money be approved. Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted in a letter to all House members that, "This past summer reminded us anew of the serious power shortages in the East and the very real need for more dependable sources of electricity."

The House voted against the public power funds, however, in semi-darkness.

The lights at the Capitol were dimmed because of a regional electric power shortage and equipment breakdowns.

James B. Booe Elected A CWA Vice President

James B. Booe was elected by the Communications Workers executive board to succeed Richard W. Hackler as vice president of CWA District 9. Hackler has been named an assistant to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, replacing LaRoy H. Purdy, 65, who is retiring.

Booe has served as Hackler's assistant in District 9 since 1968. Hackler was first elected vice president of the district in 1965 and re-elected in 1967 and 1969. The district takes in the states of Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Alaska and Hawaii.

Purdy was the union's civic affairs director from 1955 until his appointment as assistant to the president in January 1969.

Hood Latches Called Hazard In Auto Fires

The Fire Fighters have called on U.S. auto manufacturers to standardize the placement of hood latch releases on autos and trucks to reduce injuries.

IAFF Pres. W. H. McClennan said that fire fighters have often suffered severe burns while searching for the hood latches of cars on fire. This situation also endangers the occupants of the vehicles, he pointed out.

Noting that the location of hood latches varies from manufacturer to manufacturer and model to model, McClennan said the problem is further compounded by the increasing frequency of styling changes.

The appeal for standardizing the location of hood latches was sent to the heads of the major auto makers and their trade association. Copies of the appeal also were sent to key government officials and members of Congress.

Unions Called to Mobilize For 'Chips-Down' Election

THE CHIPS ARE DOWN for the November elections and labor must come up with effective support for its liberal friends in Congress, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the 29th convention of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Seattle. He warned of a vicious propaganda campaign that "is designed to equate liberals with crime and disorder." IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard is seated at Meany's right.

Public Jobs Bill Clears House Panel

By David L. Perlman

With strong bipartisan endorsement, the House Labor Committee approved a manpower training bill including a large-scale union-sought public service jobs program.

The legislative breakthrough came as the Administration backed down from its previous opposition to earmarking federal manpower funds for the public sector of the economy.

Just a week earlier, the Administration had sought to delete a mandatory public-sector job creation program from a manpower bill being considered by the Senate. But its amendments were rejected by one-sided margins and the bill was passed, 68-6.

Both the House and Senate bills provide federal funding of 80 percent of the cost of putting unemployed and underemployed workers on city, state and other public service payrolls to perform "necessary and vital" work.

The concept had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO, which pointed to both the inability of cities to finance needed community services and the inability of the private sector of the economy to provide the jobs needed for full employment.

An afternoon and long night of negotiations led to the bipartisan agreement that vastly enhanced the chances of completing congressional action before Congress adjourns.

The prod to the Administration came when Democratic members of a Labor subcommittee voted to recommend to the full committee a public service job bill authored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Suddenly Administration officials sent urgent word to the bill's supporters that they wanted to talk.

With O'Hara and Republicans William A. Steiger (Wis.) and Albert H. Quie (Minn.) playing major roles, the final version was hammered out in a marathon session more akin to collective bargaining negotiations than to legislative drafting.

It provided somewhat less money for public service employment than the Senate bill. But it included a key requirement that obligated the Labor Dept. to earmark a portion of the multi-billion dollar manpower funds for the new public service program.

The department would have a considerable part of the flexibility it sought in determining how the federal money would be divided. But it would not have the free hand it initially sought to disregard the congressional mandate for public service jobs.

The next day, the full Labor Committee formally voted to substitute the bipartisan agreement

Meany Cites Bid to Smear Labor Allies

Seattle—The American labor movement was summoned to its greatest political effort for the Nov. 3 election and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned that "the chips are really down."

Progressive congressmen and senators who have been allied with labor's goals are "fighting for their political lives," Meany stressed in a speech to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers convention.

They are the targets, he charged, of "a vicious, high-powered, well-financed Madison Avenue campaign designed to discredit all liberals in Congress."

The smear campaign, Meany said, "is designed to equate liberals with crime and disorder. . . . The American people are being bombarded with vicious propaganda to the effect that those who believe in progress for all Americans are opposed to law and order."

Meany urged union members to "support COPE as never before." If labor doesn't effectively support its friends, if they are defeated on Election Day, "it may be a long time before we are able to undo the harm that will surely come our way," Meany warned.

"Unemployment . . . housing . . . education . . . the nation's health" are among the key issues before the voters, he said.

He called for "the complete coordinated effort of every national and international union, every state federation, every city central body, every local union, and every individual member" in the campaign.

An effort of that magnitude must be made, Meany stressed, "if we are going to win and continue to move forward in the solution of many of the nation's problems."

Labor's friends, unlike its enemies, "are not going to get support from big business or the big financial power structure in this country," he said. "They must of necessity look to us for that support."

The American labor move-

Steelworkers Gear For Contract Goals

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City—The Steelworkers' 15th biennial convention focused on basic economic problems—the combination of inflation and recession besetting the nation and the shrinking buying power and rising unemployment afflicting workers.

The union's 3,500 delegates turned to the task of formulating programs to solve these problems.

For 1.2 million members of the USWA, the key efforts will be exerted at the bargaining table as the union's major contracts come up for renewal next year.

More current emphasis will be on the 1970 elections and continued legislative action in Congress.

Pres. I. W. Abel declared in his keynote address that the USWA will be bargaining for substantial wage increases "that will redress some of the economic wrongs that we Steelworkers have suffered during these last few years."

He vowed that the union would be battling for the "best contracts ever."

High on the bargaining list are a shorter workweek, a return to the cost-of-living agreement, improved pensions and a two-week summer shutdown of entire industries to end vacation conflicts.

The union will be bargaining with peak strength, Abel stressed, with membership rolls comparable to the level reached in 1956 and USWA assets at an all-time high of more than $50 million.

Major contracts of the union begin expiring early next year, starting with the container industry on Feb. 15, followed by the aluminum industry on May 31 and with copper mining, smelting and refining on June 30. The basic steel pacts terminate Aug. 1.

Negotiations won't be easy,

Unit of 30,000 Picks IBEW in New England

Boston—The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers defeated two unaffiliated unions to win bargaining rights for nearly 30,000 employes of the New England Telephone Co.

In a five-state election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, operators and plant employes spread over 504 locations picked the IBEW to represent them. The results:

- In the traffic division, IBEW 5,226, New England Federation of Telephone Traffic Workers 3,048, challenged 43, void 208. The vote for the IBEW represented 62.7 percent of the valid ballots cast.
- In the plant election, IBEW 7,787, International Brotherhood of Telephone Workers 3,822, challenged 27, void 239. The IBEW drew 67 percent of the total valid vote.

The election was a runoff between

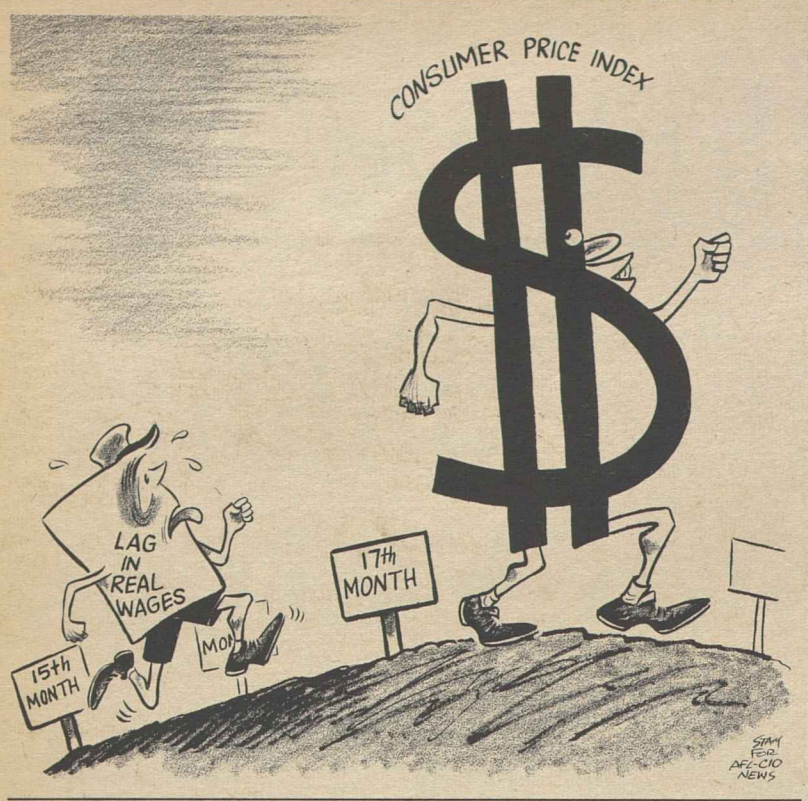
Jobless Rate Above 6% In 35 Major Centers

Thirty-five major manpower centers across the country were affected by "substantial" unemployment—a jobless rate of 6 percent or more—in September, four more than in August. The Labor Dept. listed only five job centers with "substantial" unemployment in September 1969.

The four new additions are Flint and Saginaw, Mich.; Anaheim-Santa Ana-Garden Grove, Calif., and Albuquerque, N.M. The Labor Dept. has also added eight smaller job centers to the "substantial" list. They are Center, Ala.; Cedarton, Ga.; Jerome, Idaho; Waterloo, Iowa; Wellington, Kan.; North Adams, Mass., and Owosso, Mich.



There are now 609 major and smaller job centers classified as having "substantial" or "persistent" unemployment. The "persistent" classification is used when the unemployment rate has been at 6 percent or more for a year and has been at least 50 percent above the U.S. average for several years.

Meany Slates Broadcasts On 1970 Election Stakes

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will make two nationwide radio broadcasts on "The worker's stake in the 1970 elections."

Both broadcasts will be on the Columbia Broadcasting System's radio network. They will be aired at 7:35 p.m. (Eastern time) on Thursday, Oct. 22 and Thursday, Oct. 29.

Since some stations may carry the broadcasts at different hours, individual CBS stations should be contacted for the exact local broadcast time.

Drive for Voters Held Vital in Illinois Election

Peoria—Adlai E. Stevenson, III, Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate seat now held by Ralph Smith (R), urged the 2,300 delegates to the 13th annual convention of the Illinois State AFL-CIO here to get voters registered and to the polls if they want friends of labor elected on Nov. 3.

"The Republicans can't beat us—only our own over-confidence can," Stevenson said.

"I want to urge you: don't pay any attention to the early polls and commentators that say we're far ahead. Instead, if you want a man who's on the working man's side in the U.S. Senate, help us to register the people and help us get them to the polls. We can win this election—and we will—if you work hard, and together. . . ."

Stevenson, currently Illinois state treasurer, blamed the GOP for the nation's economic problems. He said, "Today the working man is being squeezed as he has not been squeezed since the last time the Republicans were in power."

"Falling production, vanishing jobs, soaring prices, low buying power—it adds up to continuing inflation and increasing recession. And the one who gets hurt is the working man," Stevenson declared.

The delegates affirmed earlier endorsement of Stevenson by the Illinois State Committee on Political Education.

U.S. Sen. Charles H. Percy, the first GOP senator to address the convention in many years, was warmly received. Percy has a record of voting with labor 10 of 11 times in the last session of Congress. He said:

"I wasn't sent to Washington to be a rubber stamp for anyone, even if he is President of the United States.

"I supported Pres. Nixon 78 percent of the time. But when they nominate men to the Supreme Court who are insensitive to the working man and conflict of interest, then they're not going to get my vote."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, called on blacks and whites to start talking about economics and stop calling each other names. He urged blacks and labor to unite because they are the two forces most capable of bringing about social change and redistribution of wealth.

Reuben G. Soderstrom retired after 40 years as president of the state federation. He sent a letter of resignation from Streator, Ill., where he is convalescing after a heart attack.

Stanley L. Johnson, executive vice president, was named president. Johnson was secretary-treasurer of the Illinois AFL before merger with the Illinois CIO. He was named executive vice president at the 1958 merger convention.

Delegates voted unanimously to oppose the proposed new state constitution which goes before the voters in a special election Dec. 15.

In other convention action, the delegates set goals for the next session of the Illinois legislature, referred national legislative questions to the AFL-CIO and called for a negotiated settlement of the war in Viet Nam.

Tax Experts' Local Is, Naturally, 1040

New York — A new local chartered by the Office & Professional Employes has been given a number that its members won't easily forget.

The new unit is OPEIU Local 1040 and its members are income tax filing specialists who work in New York and Chicago.

They spend much of their time dealing with the Internal Revenue Service's Form 1040, the key document used in filing income tax returns.

Abel Outlines Goals:

Steelworker Delegates Arm For Major Contract Battles

Abel warned. "Prepare now for an all-out fight that we shall undertake in 1971," he said.

He promised progress in contracts: "There's no mystery about our objective. We all know what we want. Let no corporation with which this union has a contract have any doubt about what we mean."

Abel served notice on the steel industry and other sectors of the Steelworkers' jurisdiction that the union would be fighting to regain the cost-of-living agreement which was lost in 1959. It "will be restored to us in 1971," he declared.

The agreement will not be inflationary if prices and the nation's economic situation can be kept in check, Abel said, adding:

"We Steelworkers offer this challenge to the Nixon Administration and the corporations: If you keep the cost of living steady . . . we won't get a penny from this cost-of-living clause. It only works when prices rise. As for Steelworkers, we'd rather have steady prices than an eternal penny-ante rat-race to catch up with rising prices."

Abel blamed the "disastrous economic policies" of the Administration and the "greed for profits" of corporations for the nation's economic situation.

He said the Administration's plan to halt inflation has made the Steelworker the "fall guy" through unemployment and shrinking paychecks.

"That's a hell of a way to try to run a national economy," Abel said, adding, "We're announcing right now that we're sick and tired of paying through the nose for your Republican inflation program. . . . 1971 is the year we stop paying this form of economic ransom."

Abel also rebuked the Administration's "blue collar strategy" in wooing votes of workers for the Republicans in the November election and in 1972.

He said that Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew's appeal to workers in trying to win a Republican Congress for the President is "like putting the fox in the chicken coop to guard the chickens."

He cited the record of past Republican Congresses in enacting anti-labor legislation and more recent efforts of the Administration to pack the Supreme Court with anti-union justices.

Abel called on the Democrats to improve the stature and focus of their party. "It is high time, for the Democratic Party to end its tolerance of platform patriots and Inauguration Day soldiers who fade away when the going gets rough," he declared.

He said he was not giving a blanket endorsement of the Democratic party nor a blanket condemnation of the Republican party, stressing that "we are interested in defeating our enemies—those people who on the record cast their votes against us every time the chips are down."

The convention reaffirmed the USWA policy of bargaining from strength and resorting to the "ultimate strike weapon" when confronted by the refusal of employers to work out just settlements.

Several appeals from the floor to give local unions the right to strike during the term of a contract which carries a "no-strike clause" were rejected.

The appeals were based on the contention that local grievances many times were being ignored or were too costly and took too long to resolve.

Abel later noted that the appeals to the convention reflected the growing frustration of the locals over the difficulty in resolving grievances. He suggested that an improved system be devised to bring about orderly and equitable adjustments.

Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson was on hand to defend the policies of the Administration, which he contended were not anti-labor but were "people-minded."

He said that the Administration set out 20 months ago, when Pres. Nixon took office, to cool inflation and reduce defense spending—and that the Administration has accomplished those objectives.

"We're putting the nation back on a course that spells healthy growth. . . . We've curbed tail-chasing inflation, we've knocked off heavy defense spending and we've kept a steady hand in dealing with unrest," Hodgson declared.

But he admitted that the Administration's inflation-control policies may push the unemployment rate "a trifle higher" above the current 5.1 percent level.

Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.) looked on the unemployment situation with more intense concern. He pointed out to the delegates that since Nixon took over "a minimum of 1.5 million American workers have lost their livelihoods."

Today, he said, there are 5 million workers out of jobs—"that we know of. And the Bureau of Labor Statistics doesn't even count some people."

The first year of the Nixon Adminstration, Montoya said, was the most inflationary since 1951 with the cost of living rising 6.1 percent. He also scored the Administration for appointing "union-haters" to the National Labor Relations Board.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, called on Negro members of the USWA to resist any form of separation from the labor movement.

And Rustin urged white members to "eradicate every last vestige" of racial discrimination within the union.

Article XX Sanctions Imposed on Pressmen

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified all affiliates that the International Printing Pressmen's & Assistants' Union has been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice Presidents David Sullivan and Max Greenberg.

The findings, Meany said, followed the refusal of the union to "withdraw its petition pending before the National Labor Relations Board involving employes of Herff Jones Co., Indianapolis, Ind."

In his notification to affiliates, Meany said the union, effective Sept. 25, 1970, would be subject to the following provisions of Sec. 15 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Sec. 16;

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article;

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution;

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to the Printing Pressmen, the following unions are currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision: the Air Line Pilots Association, National Maritime Union and the International Typographical Union.

Oregon AFL-CIO Shifts To Biennial Conventions

Roseburg, Ore.—The Oregon AFL-CIO's 15th annual convention was its last such. From now on the Beaver State labor federation will hold constitutional assemblies in the odd-numbered years and COPE endorsement sessions in the even-numbered years.

The federation's leadership proposed the change to make the State AFL-CIO a more potent force in politics. In the future, COPE endorsement sessions will be held within seven weeks of the May primary, which will give labor at least four months to rally support for the endorsed candidates prior to the November general election.

This year as in the past, the federation has only about five weeks to crank up its support machinery on behalf on endorsed candidates.

The streamlining of the convention schedule was proposed by Pres. Edward J. Whelan, Legislative & Political Education Dir. Lloyd B. Knudsen and Sec.-Treas. Glenn E. Randall "to provide a stronger State AFL-CIO political education and action posture."

The more than 400 delegates to the four-day convention in this southwestern Oregon timber community endorsed two Democratic representatives for re-election — Edith Green and Al Ullman. They backed Eugene property developer James Weaver against incumbent Republican Rep. John Dellenback, who has a poor labor voting record.

The most excitement at the convention centered on the endorsement in the state's other congressional race—between incumbent Republican Wendell Wyatt and his Democratic challenger Vern Cook, a long-time state senator. The delegates then voted to make no endorsement in the race. That action reflected the state labor movement's respect for Cook's excellent voting record in the legislature and its high regard for the job Wyatt is doing in Washington.

Democratic State Treasurer Robert Straub got the endorsement for governor over incumbent Republican Tom McCall. The latter defeated Straub in the 1966 gubernatorial race in which the Democrat also had COPE's backing. In his bid for the '70 endorsement, Straub attacked the Nixon Administration's economic policies for hurting Oregon's timber and housing industries and causing an unemployment rate that is higher than the national average. He linked McCall to the policies of the national GOP Administration.

The convention took action on some 80 resolutions—highlighted by supporting the proposed Trojan nuclear power plant of Portland General Electric Co. and calling on Congress for funds for the Seattle-based Boeing Corporation's development of the SST (supersonic transport aircraft).

Delegates also urged Congress to appropriate funds for an expanded merchant marine, and called for improvements in state legislation affecting consumer rights, job safety, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, and collective bargaining for public employes.

Challenges Overcome:

Rubber Union Ready For Growth Drive

By Eugene Kelly

Miami Beach—The Rubber Workers have met every challenge of their first 35 years of existence and are ready for an influx of 150,000 new members in the decade ahead, Pres. Peter Bommarito told the union's convention here.

The 220,000-member organization, its Big Five industry negotiations completed and its financial house in order, is now free to concentrate on organizing, improving its bargaining techniques, intensifying its political education activities in this crucial election year and stepping up its leadership training in the new locals it is prepared to charter, Bommarito reported in opening the five-day convention for 840 delegates from 321 local unions in the United States and Canada.

The URW's three top officers and its 14-member executive board gave the delegates a set of proposals including a three-year convention and officer election schedule; a "dynamic and progressive" organizing program; a more vigorous membership role in re-electing progressive candidates for federal and state office; and a program aimed at bringing more "quality education and training" into union halls.

Its organizing efforts cover the cork, linoleum and plastics industry, as well as basic rubber.

Bommarito said the union has added 25 field representatives to its staff for organizing and servicing members and has named five of the seven education directors who will launch the new training program in union districts.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated the Rubber Workers on the steady progress they have made "in an industry difficult to organize" and one not noted for its friendship to labor.

The most crucial problem facing the nation at present is health care—adequate medical care for all instead of a health delivery system that is failing to meet the nation's needs, the federation leader asserted.

"We know that American doctors and hospitals can provide the best medical care," so long as patients have the money to pay for it, Meany said.

"We in the trade union movement want this high standard of excellence made available to all Americans."

Union members are well aware that protection against failing health takes a larger and ever larger share of the economic benefits won from employers at the bargaining table, he observed.

The "only answer," Meany emphasized, "is a national health care system financed like social security and covering every man, woman and child. We will be putting on a real drive for enactment of a national health care law—enactment hopefully in the next session of Congress."

Meany predicted "national health insurance is coming because the needs of the American people will compel its enactment, and in a short time."

Others who addressed the convention were Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Vice Pres. David Archer of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey of the Auto Workers, who urged an all-union defense fund to meet future challenges like that of the General Electric Co. against a coordinated union committee.

Hall reported that SIU members, angry over the indictment of their union on charges of unlawfully contributing money to political candidates, said "we'll fight Att. Gen. Mitchell all the way." One result of the indictment, he said, is that union members have vowed to raise at least $100,000 more in voluntary, lawful political contributions than ever before.

Final days of the convention were to be devoted to streamlining the constitution, electing officers for new terms and setting new programs.

Bommarito said in his president's report that in the last half of the Sixties, the URW faced and withstood some of its greatest tests for survival.

"Not only did we have one crushing struggle after another on the picket lines which probed the depths of our courage and our capacity to fight for equity, but a series of crises developed within the financial structure of the union that demanded sound decisions by your officers and the membership," he said.

Recent contracts with the five major rubber firms brought the largest benefit package in the union's 35-year history, plus one achievement that blazed a trail for others—an agreement with management to establish a joint occupational health program funded by the companies. The program, Bommarito said, is designed to eliminate occupational health hazards now present in plant workplaces.

Under the agreement, employers will put the equivalent of one-half cent per hour into a fund which will be used for improvements. The first step is an intensive study of employe health and safety problems by the School of Hygiene & Public Health of Johns Hopkins University.

Another problem, he said, is "a staggering number of local union strikes" forced by managements which have refused to settle on the local level along the lines of the industry pattern. Some 98 separate strikes have been called since November 1968 and 20 are still in process, he said.

HUNDREDS OF CABBIES in New York City march in a procession to St. Patrick's Cathedral mourning the death of Benjamin Rivera, a member of Taxi Drivers Local 3036, who had been slain in a holdup. He was the seventh driver murdered in the city this year. The union is seeking increased protection for the drivers from the city and the taxi industry.

Airline Unions from 21 Nations Map Joint Action Against Plane Hijackers

Miami Beach—The active participation of all major airline unions in 21 countries in united action against any nation which gives "assistance, support or sanctuary" to airline hijackers or plane saboteurs was pledged here by a world aviation workers conference.

Such action could include a quarantine or boycottof an offending nation, the conference agreed.

American unions were hosts to the biennial meeting of the International Transportworkers Federation's civil aviation section. The 98 delegates from all continents voiced their horror at the rising incidence of terrorist acts against passenger airlines and spelled out actions they want every government to take.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates the federation is "solidly behind you" and assured them the American labor movement is ready to cooperate in their efforts to eliminate sabotage against plane crews and passengers.

Host unions were the Machinists, Transport Workers, Railway & Airline Clerks, Flight Engineers and Dispatchers. The Air Line Pilots sent an observer, and so did the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations.

In other action, the conference voted support for 4,000 IAM members and 3,500 Airline Clerks on strike for a fair contract at Northwest Airlines. Also it went on record favoring tripartite conferences to be called by the International Labor Organization. The delegates made it clear they want uniform standards of pay and working conditions for airline employes across the free world—standards that do not now exist.

The major business of the conference was agreement on a joint plan of action to meet the problem of air hijacking and sabotage of planes.

The conference issued a report "noting with satisfaction" the success of efforts made by an ITF delegation at a June meeting in Montreal on airline security—a meeting called by the International Civil Aviation Organization.

The meeting recommended a wide range of security measures at airports and on planes including the use of electronic detection devices and close surveillance of baggage in cargo compartments, processed to protect the lives of baggage handlers.

It stressed conference recommendations "which if properly implemented will provide genuine safeguards against attempts at hijacking or sabotaging aircraft." They would also insure that the "perpetrators of such criminal acts which cannot be prevented shall be apprehended and subjected to appropriately severe penalties laid down by law."

The conference "requests the ITF secretariat" in London to continue to keep a close watch on developments in this field; to insure that the ITF section on civil aviation is "properly represented" at international discussions of the subject; and to "intervene energetically and effectively in any situation where life and limb or the personal freedom of employes, and safety generally, warrants."

The delegates called on "all governments, airlines and airport administrators to act without delay" to implement the security recommendations made at Montreal, and to "facilitate the immediate creation of airport security committees on which representatives of airline and airport employes shall be seated as of right."

Such action will make sure that national legislation on the subject of hijacking "provides for the trial, punishment and, where appropriate, the extradition" of those committing criminal acts, the conference declared.

Charles Blyth, ITF general secretary, said union action against acts of plane sabotage would include but not be limited to the quarantine — meaning boycott—of any state or nation which demonstrably assists or gives sanctuary to hijackers.

He said "we want every nation to go on record for an international treaty pledging to prosecute or, on demand, send back any captured hijackers and put into effect all measures to prevent criminal interference with air traffic."

"We want that action quickly," Blyth said.

J. K. Post of The Netherlands was conference chairman.

The Old Play-Money Trick Used To Lure Real Dollars for R-T-W

Memo to Hubert Humphrey and Larry O'Brien:

Don't get excited. It's only a "simulated" $60 million check and you can't use it to pay off debts from the 1968 campaign, even if it is made out to the Humphrey for President Campaign.

Sorry about that.

But the "check" isn't entirely without value, even though a bank would certainly cast a fishy eye at a signature reading "compulsory union dues."

To the National Right to Work Committee, which thought up the gimmick, it is a lure to bring in real money—not just play money—from corporations and businessmen.

The solicitation of "fully tax deductible" contributions from corporations and employers is being made in the name of the National Advisory Council of Business Leaders of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation.

The parent National Right to Work Committee, of course, is in business to promote compulsory open shop laws, prohibiting workers and employers from negotiating union shop agreements.

Its "legal defense foundation" apparently operates on the basis that the best defense is a good offense. It says it is "now engaged in 12 major court cases which challenge compulsory unionism."

But to carry on this "vital work," it needs "a bare minimum" of $34,000 a month.

That comes to $408,000 a year—somewhat of an escalation from the more modest goal of a similar fund drive earlier this year. Then, in a solicitation letter sent out by Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.) on Senate stationery, the "bare minimum" goal was only $115,000.

The latest solicitation for "tax-deductible" donations is signed by an Oklahoma City corporation executive, Thomas J. Harris, a leader in the unsuccessful compaigns to enact "right-to-work" laws in Oklahoma.

The fake $60 million check—"simulated" is the word Harris uses—is supposed to represent "the amount of union dues money spent in 1968 by union officials on the Humphrey for President campaign." Most of it, the "business leaders" council asserts, was taken from "men and women who were forced to join unions."

A spokesman for the National Right to Work Committee told the AFL-CIO News that the $60 million figure was based on a columnist's estimate of the value of labor's political effort in the 1968 campaign.

Since the labor-supported Humphrey-Muskie ticket could only afford to buy $6.1 million in television and radio time compared with $12.6 million spent by the Nixon-Agnew slate, and since the total reported spending of the Democratic campaign was only $13.6 million as compared with a GOP figure of $29.6 million, the "right-to-work" estimate would seem a wee bit high.

But, the "work" committee spokesman explained, even though the "simulated" $60 million check was made out to the Humphrey for President campaign, it wasn't supposed to represent labor's cash contributions but the value of services rendered—by "labor bosses," presumably.

All clear, now?

An Apple a Day

IN JULY 1969 Pres. Nixon warned the nation that it was facing a possible breakdown in health care and that a "massive crisis" was on the horizon.

In September 1970 a Nixon health care program to meet the crisis was still in the drafting stage. But Undersecretary of Health, Education & Welfare John G. Veneman told a congressional committee that a national health insurance plan co-sponsored by 17 senators was not needed, was unworkable, would cost too much.

The Washington Star characterized the Administration's approach as a "shot-gun assault" that "bespoke too strong an attachment to the status quo" and an "affection for the private health insurance system that seems out of all proportion to that system's achievement record."

Veneman topped off his opposition with a comment that the best way to improved health is to assure sufficient food, an adequate income and a healthy environment. The Star commented: "that was a platitudinous evasion of the health-care issue about on the level of prescribing an apple a day to keep the doctor away."

The Administration's spokesman put an unsupported cost of $77 billion on the national health insurance plan, a figure that health care experts declared was at least $20 billion too high and was designed to "scare the program to death."

But more importantly there is gross distortion in use of the cost figure. The NHI proposals do not represent a new expenditure of government funds. The plans would cover 85 percent of the personal health costs of the entire nation under all sorts of existing government programs and private expenditures by consumers. This would come to about $53 billion in 1974. The comparable cost for the existing health system in that year is estimated at $63 billion—fully $10 billion higher.

VENEMAN ALSO FOUND the proposals of the 17 senators—including members of both parties—"alien to our best traditions," an argument raised by the American Medical Association during its long bitter battle to defeat Medicare.

Basic to the Administration's testimony, however, was its disregard of the "massive crisis" of which the President warned a year ago July of the reality of the soaring costs of health care in the past five years, costs which have been rising at a rate nearly twice as fast as the rise in overall living costs.

The Star, an essentially conservative newspaper, said it well:

"In this field (health care) the United States is in a third-rate position among the industrial nations. It just muddles along, tolerating incredible disorganization, appalling inequities and financial ruin for people who get too sick for too long. For millions, adequate care simply is unavailable. Distribution of services is drastically uneven across the nation."

To all this the country deserves from the Administration that has publicly recognized a "massive crisis" in health care more than a we-can't-afford-it line or the alien-tradition bit, or, worst of all, an apple-a-day-remedy.

Galbraith's Political Gambits Rank Well as Entertainment

By John P. Roche

IT IS ALWAYS a mistake to pay much attention to the political precocities of John Kenneth Galbraith. Like Spiro Agnew, he has a certain entertainment value, and it is not surprising that Galbraith recently took a verbal waltz with the Vice President.

Talking to reporters, Galbraith accused Agnew of "old-fashioned hog calling," and then went on to say that the Vice President's description of people like himself as "radical liberals" was "pretty accurate." The figure of speech struck me as eccentric—Galbraith responding to an Agnew hog call—though we all have our good days and our bad.

Galbraith is actually a decent fellow, but he has a problem. In the same fashion that some individuals are born without color vision, he was born without political sense.

For years in Massachusetts Ken was in the habit of giving his personal imprimatur to political candidates, particularly in the Democratic primaries. Registered Democrats would receive a solemn letter on his stationery endorsing X for senator, Y for governor, Z for attorney general, etc.

Alas, it soon became apparent that his compass was set on True South. A Galbraith endorsement became the political equivalent of the curse of Cromwell. One candidate reportedly quit and went off to a monastery the day he got the news, and it is alleged that another—hearing that Galbraith was coming in person to his headquarters (with a photographer) to confer the accolade—broke his ankle going down the fire escape.

It is, thank God, a free country and nothing said here should be in any way construed as suggesting that Galbraith should be suppressed, oppressed, repressed or compressed. I disassociate myself completely from those who argue that the Democratic National Committee should expel him from its policy council; he is admirably qualified to be chaplain on the Titanic. The fact that he has endorsed George Bush, the Republican contender for senator from Texas, is, if properly understood, a bonus for the Democrat, Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr.

Once he appreciates that Galbraith is—wholly without malevolence—programmed for political disaster, a liberal Democrat can usefully employ the Harvard economist's suggestions as warning lights or as bell buoys marking the reefs that must be avoided.

Take, for example, his passion for cutting things clean, which has led him to propose that liberals support Republicans rather than conservative or even liberal pro-Vietnamese War Democrats. For some reason or other, he never seems to recognize that two can play at this game.

In the third Massachusetts congressional district race, Father Robert Drinan, an anti-war militant, won the Democratic nomination from Philip Philbin, an elderly gentleman who combined domestic liberalism with support for Viet Nam. Philbin refused to campaign, Drinan's supporters mounted an extremely well-organized and financed blitz, and that was that for the second ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee.

However, Drinan won the primary with 28,612 votes (49 percent of the total; there were three candidates). In November 1968, 192,000 votes were cast in a three-way congressional race in this district.

IF WE ASSUME the population to be roughly the same, Drinan will need 96,000 votes to beat his Republican adversary in November. Where will he pick up his additional 70,000?

There is a very large blue collar vote in this district which seldom turns out for primaries but is decisive in November. They are not warmongers, but they are anti-anti-war. They don't like people "tearing down the country."

Suppose they take Galbraith's advice, make the war their litmus test, but march off in the other direction? Drinan will be a dead duck—as will be Joseph Duffey in Connecticut, Craig S. Barnes in Denver, and other peace candidates who have survived the primaries.

Father Drinan, the Rev. Duffey, and Mr. Barnes—unless they have confused politics with purification rites—should want these "Middle American" votes. If they do, they had better put away their copies of Galbraith's "Who Needs the Democrats?" (or save them for ritualistic purposes) and get to work with Scammon & Wattenberg's "The Real Majority."

National Crisis:

Preventive Medicine Stressed In Drive for Health Insurance

The following is excerpted from "National Health Insurance—The Time Is Now" by Dr. Paul B. Cornely in the September 1970 AFL-CIO American Federationist. Dr. Cornely is chairman of the Dept. of Community Health Practice at the College of Medicine at Howard University. He is also chairman of the American Public Health Association.

THE UNITED STATES, the most technologically advanced country in the world, is still an underdeveloped area in the health care of its people. The health crisis in America has been long in coming and all of us, professional and lay, have allowed it to worsen in an accelerated manner.

The many facets of this well-documented crisis have been discussed through the mass media, on the platform and in scholarly articles. Any brief combination of the facts of health care is sufficient to prove the point that we are a disadvantaged nation.

The gap between the health status of the poor and those who have incomes of $10,000 or more is widening. Children in families with incomes of $2,000 a year visit a physician on the average of 2.2 times annually while those in families with incomes above $7,000 average 4.4 visits, or twice as many.

Another alarming fact is the emphasis we have placed on cure rather than prevention. Most of the $63 billion which we spend for health care in this country is really spent for sickness—mostly for hospitals, physician services and drugs.

This is seen in its most acute stage when we look at the federal health budget proposed for 1971. It requests $2.2 billion for hospital facilities and health manpower and $12.1 billion for medical services which include Medicare, Medicaid and other medical programs. But it asks only $618 million, or 3 to 4 percent of the total, for prevention. We are concerned with repair, but not with prevention or the improvement of the quality of life. Prevention suffers from malignant neglect.

It is particularly depressing that many children in this country have not been fully immunized against diseases such as smallpox, diphtheria, measles, German Measles and tetanus.

A recent issue of Morbidity and Mortality, publication of the National Communicable Disease Center, reports more than 20,000 cases of measles and more than 27,000 cases of German Measles for the first 16 weeks of 1970 and that was from only partial returns in the study. These levels are considerably higher than those for the comparable period of 1969. It has been estimated that for every 10,000 individuals who contact measles, 1 will die, 3 will be permanently retarded, 10 will develop encephalitis, 60 will be hospitalized with complications and 15,000 school days will be missed.

Amazingly, 174 cases of tetanus were reported in this country this year. And half the children under 15 have never visited a dentist.

Costs are always the most talked about when the crisis in health care is discussed. All of us are well aware that daily hospital costs have risen astronomically: In New York City one hospital has a per diem cost of $123. Between 1950 and 1967 the per capita expenditure for medical care in the United States has tripled from $78.20 per year to $231.95.

Drug costs are equally staggering. The drug industry is now a $3 billion a year business which spends some $800 million a year for public relations and the advertising to sell some 21,000 prescription drugs.

As a result of these combinations of skyrocketing costs, none of us is free of the fear of hospital and medical bills which can be financially devastating to almost any American family. Other nations live without this fear, as in England, Germany and Sweden. And other nations have national formularies on drugs. If the United States had such a formulary, the present 21,000 drugs would be reduced to 1,200 with guarantees against drugs with no added advantage being introduced simply because they could be exploited to the maximum.

But we don't have these systems in the United States. And because we don't we are left to bemoan the facts: Our infant mortality rate is 14th among the developed countries of the world; our mortality rate for mothers at childbirth is 9th and our life expectancy is 21st.

An important factor in this national crisis is that health is not accepted as a social responsibility either by government or by the private sector. Federal health agencies are not sufficiently concerned with protecting the consumers.

The Food & Drug Administration has not been willing to use its administrative capabilities to remove ineffective and even hazardous drugs from the market.

The Dept. of Agriculture has been concerned more often with protecting the farmer than feeding the hungry and malnourished.

THESE HEALTH CRISES are of paramount importance, but the one which is most acute and which causes the greatest amount of anxiety and fear is the inability to get good health care when it's needed. This country certainly must guarantee every one of its citizens this important right. And more people grow convinced daily that this guarantee cannot be made without adopting a rational, national plan.

Americans have been patient in waiting—too long now—for the solution to this problem. But even now they are told by some forces to proceed along avenues which have been proven inadequate.

There is no doubt that national health insurance is an idea whose time has come and some form of it will become a reality in the 1970s. Unlike five years ago, it is being discussed on all sides and by all kinds of people. The poor people are well aware that Medicaid is not the answer. Most of the "silent majority" are beginning to realize that they really cannot afford private medical care any more than they can afford private preparatory schools. The very rich really do not care.

Impact of Nixon Policies:

More Unemployment Expected From 'Engineered Recession'

UNEMPLOYMENT ROLLS will continue to swell as the recession "engineered by the Administration" bottoms-out, unless the economy gets a stimulus to boost sales and production, organized labor's top economist predicted.

The sagging housing industry and urban redevelopment, said AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, are two areas where a pickup could help ease the slowdown resulting from Administration economic policies advanced "in the guise of anti-inflation" measures.

He said that recent cuts of some prime interest rates "will help a bit," but "interest rates have to be brought down substantially" to reduce the pressure on prices and give a lift to the economy. He pointed out that the "average effective rate on new FHA-insured mortgages" is still 9.15 percent.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said there is no effective reduction in the pace of inflationary pressures to date.

"The Administration's spokesmen keep telling us to just watch and wait and see," but "what we've seen in prices continuing up at a fairly rapid clip" and further dilution of the buying power of workers' wages, the union economist asserted. He said that with spreading production cutbacks and layoffs, and with 1.5 million new workers entering the labor force each year, "the employment and unemployment situation is continuing to deteriorate and worsen."

GOLDFINGER was also critical of Administration tax proposals now before Congress, especially the added tax on leaded gasoline, advanced as an anti-pollution measure. He said that would be an "unfair tax on the consumer," and would not be an effective curb on pollution. He said it would be "a license to pollute, if you pay the price."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR 25 YEARS it has been the stated policy of the United States to set as a national goal a useful job at a reasonable wage for all who wish to work.

Fulfilling that goal has been far from easy and there have been periods during those 25 years—we are now in the midst of one—when we have failed dismally.

During the past decade the federal government has launched a series of manpower programs to meet the job deficit. Billions of dollars have been spent on training programs; cities and states have been aided in tracking down jobs through their employment services; private business has been subsidized to offer training and provide jobs. Organized labor has played an important role, too.

Despite these efforts, it must be confessed that the programs have far from solved the problem either of training great numbers of Americans for better jobs or placing them in jobs after their training has been finished.

With unemployment headed for the 5 million mark it is inevitable that Americans must ask themselves if we have exhausted the needs that ought and should be met so that there is nothing for the unemployed to do?

The answer is obvious. We have only to look around to see the vast amount of unfinished business that faces the Nation—the huge tasks of making our cities decently habitable; of cleaning up our polluted rivers and lakes; of filling thousands of vitally needed jobs in education, public health, safety, recreation, sanitation . . . the list is endless.

Yet, we still shy away from finding means of enriching our national environment and life and, at the same time, providing useful and satisfying work for the unemployed.

We found the means to do much of it during the Great Depression of the Thirties when the National Industrial Recovery Act provided federal funds for important conservation programs in the countryside and for the rehabilitation of slums and ghettos in the city.

We did it partly and timidly with the Youth Job Corps and the Neighborhood Youth Corps in recent years. But these programs have largely been gutted by the Nixon Administration and by Congress. More and more the Administration has turned to the private sector to provide the jobs that are needed.

ORGANIZED LABOR has repeatedly declared that if the needed jobs are to be found, the federal government must become "the employer of last resort." The Administration has rejected this.

Now the Senate Labor Committee has come up with a bill amending the Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962 that supports the labor thesis.

Not only does it suggest numerous improvements in the manpower program, but as passed by the Senate it calls for the establishment of a new system of public service employment run largely through state governors and mayors of cities of 75,000 or more population to set up public service programs with 80 percent federal financing.

The sum of $750 million would be provided for the first year's operation with a total of $1.5 billion at the end of three years.

The committee, in its report recommending this program, notes that every task force since the riots of 1967 has pointed to the twin "problems of joblessness and inadequate public services in urban and rural poverty communities" and has called for a substantial public service employment program.

Clearly the bill justifies the warning that private industry cannot provide the jobs that are needed and cannot, of course, perform the public service tasks that so obviously need to be done.

The need is there. The labor force is there. It is hard to see what arguments can be made against seizing the opportunity to carry out a great national constructive job and provide employment at the same time.

THE RECESSION "engineered" by the Administration will drive already severe unemployment even higher unless there are steps to give the economy a lift, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, told Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Yarborough Praises Unions On Aid to U.S.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough, the chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, had something he wanted to say before AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany left the witness table after testifying in favor of national health insurance legislation.

Yarborough, a victim of the Texas Democratic primary, will not be returning to the Senate next year. This, he noted, might be the last time he would be hearing Meany testify before his committee.

"I want to thank you for all of the things you have done for all Americans," Yarborough told Meany and the AFL-CIO.

"Scores of millions," he said, have been the beneficiaries of labor's efforts.

"As I look over the list of bills you have put the weight of the AFL-CIO behind, nine out of 10 don't just deal with labor. They deal with health and education of all the people."

Yarborough singled out the eight-year fight for the legislation he sponsored to provide education, training and other benefits for returning servicemen—patterned after the G.I. bills of World War II and Korea.

"Yours was the first great national organization" to rally support for the bill, he noted. While veteran and education groups initially stood on the sidelines, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller "came up and testified, for it right from the start."

Yarborough said he knows from his own political campaigns that some people express "fear" of labor's role.

But, Yarborough added, "if they knew what organized labor has really done, they would be singing the praises" of the American labor movement.

National Health Plan Held Better System

New York—Americans need a better system of providing medical care as well as a means of financing it, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman stressed during a televised "discussion" with a spokesman for the American Medical Association.

The solution, he said, is a national health insurance program and not the AMA's "medi-credit" proposal of federal tax credits to subsidize part of the cost of existing private health insurance.

Seidman said the AMA plan assumes that "there's nothing wrong with the medical care system that we have in the United States today, except for the fact that there are some people who really can't afford to purchase it."

Even the Nixon Administration appears to recognize that "we do need a very substantial change in the organization and delivery of medical care," Seidman noted. But the Administration, he suggested, sees this as an excuse for inaction, maintaining that until medical services and facilities become more available, "we shouldn't do anything about financing" health care.

Seidman took part in the Equal Time program carried by Station WPIX-TV in New York, along with James Brindle, president of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, and Bernard Harrison, an official of the American Medical Association.

The AMA spokesman termed the labor-supported national health insurance legislation a "pie in the sky" approach "that would seek to restructure the whole health care system."

Seidman and Brindle retorted that the existing health care system does, indeed, need restructuring as well as financing.

National health insurance bills in the House and Senate, Seidman said, would provide incentives for "the necessary expansion" of health care facilities and manpower at the same time that a means of financing would be provided through government, employer and worker payments.

Seidman characterized the Administration's Senate testimony opposing national health insurance as "an entirely negative statement."

It is "quite clear," Seidman said, "that the Nixon Administration does not want to move in the whole question of health care. It has fought the Congress, which has tried to expand existing programs. It has tried to cut back on programs like Medicare and Medicaid. It has fought the expansion of facilities for hospitals."

But despite this opposition, he declared, "the prospects for enactment of national health insurance are better than they have been at any time."

Medical Care Program Set for Rhode Island

Providence—Rhode Island labor's new health care program will be in operation by next March, its medical director reported at the state AFL-CIO convention here.

Plans for delivering services to some 10,000 union members and their families are on schedule, Dr. Harry E. Darrah, the program's medical director, and federation Sec.-Treas, Edwin C. Brown told more than 509 delegates from 275 locals.

The plan is based on an agreement signed by the Rhode Island Group Health Association and two private hospitals a few months ago after three years of effort.

The hospitals have agreed to grant hospital privileges to GHA doctors who will conduct a pre-paid group practice program of comprehensive medical care for union families with the cooperation of the Medical School of Brown University.

The convention re-elected Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Brown for another two-year term and named eight new executive board members and 32 incumbents. It also endorsed major candidates for federal and state office after hearing all the candidates speak, and established a program of legislative action for the future.

Gov. Frank Licht announced the calling of a special legislative session to bring the state's unemployment insurance program into conformity with a federal amendment permitting states to pay up to 13 more weeks for jobless workers who exhaust their layoff insurance.

During the convention 200 delegates paraded to television station WPRI—Channel 12— to help station announcers, photographers and newsmen picket for a first contract. The strikers are members of Local 1281, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The convention's traditional candidates' night brought out 16 aspirants from the two major parties and representatives of the Peace and Freedom and Social Democratic parties.

Later the delegates voted to endorse Sen. John O. Pastore, Representatives Fernand St. Germain and Robert O. Tiernan, and Licht. All are Democrats running for re-election Nov. 3.

Other convention speakers included Pres. Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists, Vice Pres. J. Harold Daoust of the Textile Workers Union of America, Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, and Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Barkan stressed the importance of voting in a campaign complicated by the raising of "phony issues."

Daoust urged better control of job-destroying foreign imports. He said anyone who buys foreign-made products is "buying a little bit of depression" for American workers.

Famed Justin Boots Now Union Made

Fort Worth, Tex.—The Justin boot, famous for nearly 100 years as footwear for cowboys, has gone union. The people who make the boot here voted 256-133 in a National Labor Relations Board election to be represented by the United Shoe Workers.

The Justin firm's trademark has been a fixture of life in the West since 1879. Not only have many cowpokes worn the Justin boot but their Hollywood counterparts of TV and the wide screen followed suit, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. N. H. Kurko reported.

All-Out Labor Drive Urged for Election

ment, Meany told the delegates, has always stood for progress for all of the people. It approaches the nation's problems with the conviction that "no special interest group could make progress for any length of time at the expense of the population as a whole."

Never in its history, he stressed, "has labor advocated any program that did not bring benefit to the entire society."

He recited the step-by-step gains that the labor movement and the nation have made in eradicating social evils, in building a better life for its members and for all Americans.

"We still have a long way to go," Meany declared, but "we are going to have no patience with those who believe that the way to improve the system is to tear it down." And labor is not going to "knuckle down" to "extremists from either the right or the left."

In a keynote speech to the convention, IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard told the delegates that "political education in our union is a must."

He observed that because organized labor is a minority at the polls, "we need other minorities as they need us" to form a coalition "working together to accomplish legislative goals for the betterment of all the people."

Along with its political effort, Pillard said, labor must use its strength at the bargaining table to provide a better life for workers.

He spoke of the IBEW's goals of improved vacations and holidays, of "health and welfare plans paid for by the industry we serve," of retirement "at an age which will assure members of a few restful years of living," and of "a shorter workweek for everyone."

He urged IBEW negotiators to put special emphasis on bringing up wages of the lowest-paid workers.

And, he stressed, in an expanding electrical industry "we must either organize or we cease to exist."

Pillard told the delegates that the union's "real power" at the bargaining table lies in the skills of its members and applicants for apprenticeship and training must be chosen by fair selection methods.

The IBEW, he said, "supports and recommends affirmative action programs to survey, identify, counsel, recruit and assist applicants . . . who have not had previous opportunities to become qualified."

As convention committees continued to work on resolutions and reports for later floor action, delegates heard an array of prominent speakers, including Astronaut Neil Armstrong, the first man on the moon.

Armstrong spoke to the convention in his role as chairman of the Peace Corps Advisory Council, stressing the need for "volunteers with technical skills."

Developing nations are asking for this help, Armstrong said, and "the Peace Corps wants to provide these volunteers. We know how crucial they are to development, and how much they can help to meet human needs throughout the world."

He urged the IBEW, whose members' skills helped make the moon flight possible, to encourage the recruiting program.

"The volunteers are not being asked to go abroad to conquer someone," Armstrong said. "They are asked to go overseas to work with other people, to teach their skill to others, to be one link in a growing chain of human development."

OCAW Wins Vote At Continental Oil

Tulsa, Okla.—The Oil Workers won bargaining rights for 904 employes of the Continental Oil Co. in Ponca City, Okla., dislodging an independent union that started 34 years ago.

It was the seventh union attempt to organize the plant since 1938, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. W. G. Pendergrass said. In a runoff election, the OCAW won from the unaffiliated union by a 20-vote margin and is preparing to negotiate a contract.

Upset Victories Mark Florida Runoff Voting

Labor-supported candidates won upset victories in Florida's runoff Democratic primary and will face conservative Republican candidates for governor and senator in November.

In the gubernatorial primary, State Sen. Reubin Askew won by an impressive 117,500 vote margin over State Atty. Gen. Earl Faircloth, who had led a four-man field in the first primary.

Askew campaigned vigorously on a tax reform platform, charging that Florida has relied on "high consumer taxes designed to hit the little man while allowing special interests to virtually escape taxation."

He will face incumbent Republican governor Claude R. Kirk, Jr., a flamboyant and controversial political figure who eked out a modest victory over a millionnaire businessman, Jack Eckerd, who was making his first try for political office.

In the Democratic runoff for the senatorial nomination, State Sen. Lawton Chiles trounced conservative former Gov. Farris Bryant by more than 220,000 votes. The first time around, Bryant had polled 50,000 votes more than Chiles.

The winner, who overcame a low campaign budget with a 1,000-mile walking tour of Florida, will face a strong Republican candidate; Congressman William C. Cramer. They will battle for the seat being vacated by the retirement of Sen. Spessard L. Holland, a conservative Democrat.

Cramer didn't have to compete in a runoff. The first time around, he easily beat G. Harrold Carswell, the Senate-rejected nominee for the Supreme Court.

In another political development, the official count in a Baltimore area congressional district cost veteran Rep. Samuel N. Friedel, chairman of the House Administration Committee, renomination for a tenth term in the Maryland Democratic primary.

Initial election night tallies had shown Friedel a winner by 182 votes.

The turnabout showed Parren J. Mitchell, 48-year-old Negro leader and Morgan State College professor, winning by a photo-finish 38-vote margin.

'Deliberate Policy':

Economists Charge Recession Planned

Three economists, speaking at a legislative conference of the Meat Cutters, charged the Nixon Administration with deliberately planning a recession that worsens the economic plight of working people while favoring large banks and corporations.

The three — AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, Stanley Ruttenberg, former Assistant Secretary of Labor, and Meat Cutters Research Dir. James Wishart — spoke at a session of the union's three-day national political and legislative conference.

"Nixonomics continues to keep the country in a recession," Ruttenberg said in leading off the discussion. "At the same time . . . prices relentlessly rise at a rapid pace. . . . It's like having a flooded basement during a drought."

Ruttenberg said 1,750,000 persons are now drawing unemployment insurance benefits, with an average of 100,000 persons exhausting their benefits monthly without finding jobs. At the same time, he added, the nation is losing 130,000 jobs a month through slackening of the economy.

The recession, Ruttenberg added, "is the result of deliberate policy; it was created. It is now time to shift from a restrictive economic policy to one of expansion . . . . (This) will not create inflation in an economy as weak as ours is today."

Goldfinger said, "We have been the playthings of a vicious game plan . . . of an engineered recession . . . created by the Administration."

The economic policies of the Nixon Administration, Goldfinger charged, have resulted in both rising unemployment and rising prices, while giving benefits to the banks who could lend money at abnormally high interest rates and to corporations who were allowed to raise prices without hindrance from the White House.

Commenting on Administration claims that the economic decline is over, Goldfinger remarked, "the question is, for whom?"

He noted that the stock market decline and economic pressures on large corporations have been eased, but that unemployment continues to rise, and the interest rates on housing loans remain near their highest levels.

"Unless there is a real pickup of sales and production, we will not get a real improvement in employment," Goldfinger warned. "On the basis of the economic facts there is no such pickup of sales and production in sight. . . .

"Until we get some real moves by Congress, we will not be able to bring about the decisive changes in economic policy that are needed."

Wishart noted that the Nixon Administration when it took office "took the lid off" by announcing it would not use its powers to hold down pricing decisions by big business.

"As a consequence, the big corporations went to town jacking up prices," Wishart declared. "That was an invitation to inflation that was happily and quickly accepted."

Then, Wishart continued, the the government cuts the national money supply to help the large financial institutions and corporations, and attempted to "limit the effectiveness of labor" by planning for and creating unemployment.

"The economic policy of the Nixon Administration was aimed to serve the concentrated economic powers of the country and their interests as opposed to the interests of working people, and small business, and the common people of the country," he charged.

House Panel Clears Public Jobs Bill As Bipartisan Agreement Is Reached

for the O'Hara bill and recommend its approval.

In other major congressional developments:

● The Senate voted 59-2 approval of a multi-billion dollar housing bill that includes a Democratic-initiated program to assist development of "new cities" where people of all incomes could both live and work. The bill also extends continuing federal programs of urban renewal, public housing, rent and mortgage subsidies and mass transit.

The House Banking Committee followed through a few days later with an even bigger program—with a spending ceiling over the next three years of $7 billion, compared with $4 billion in the Senate-passed bill.

● The Senate neared final action on legislation amending the duties and powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

It rejected, 41-26, an Administration effort to kill a section of the bill giving the commission enforcement powers similar to those exercised by the National Labor Relations Board in unfair labor practice cases.

● The House approved an Administration proposal to authorize $3.1 billion in commitments for federal grants over the next five years to help communities build and improve mass transit subway and bus systems.

The House Banking Committee had sent to the floor a larger-scaled bill—allowing the Secretary of Transportation to commit up to $5 billion in transit grants. But the House, on a 200-145 rollcall, trimmed back the grant authority to the $3.1 billion proposed by the President and approved by the Senate last spring.

A House-Senate conference committee is expected to reach early agreement on minor differences between the two bills.

● Both the House and Senate gave final approval to legislation continuing federal appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which assists non-profit radio and television programming.

The day the bill went to the White House, Federal Communications Commissioner Dean Burch, speaking at a dinner meeting of the corporation, warned public broadcasting personnel against being too liberal.

Burch, who managed Barry Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign and then served as Republican national chairman, said he doesn't believe that "all creative people are liberal." But if that is the case, the chairman of the government's regulatory agency over broadcasting suggested, "you'd better go out and hire some non-creative conservatives."

● The House Commerce Committee approved a bill supported by railroad unions to establish a semi-public corporation to operate a system of inter-city passenger trains. The intent is to halt the abandonment of rail passenger service by the nation's railroads. A smaller-scaled bill has already passed the Senate.

Missouri Labor Backs Symington Re-Election

St. Louis—The Missouri AFL-CIO convention unanimously endorsed Democratic Sen. Stuart Symington for re-election as it accepted without dissent a report by the staff Committee on Political Education backing 137 Democrats and 19 Republicans for positions ranging from U.S. senator to Missouri state representative.

Vincent J. Van Camp, Jefferson City, was elected to his first full four-year term as president of the council. He was elevated to the presidency on Jan. 1 from vice president after long-time president John I. Rollings retired because of illness.

James E. Meyers, secretary-treasurer of the St. Louis AFL-CIO, was named vice president of the state council. James A. Davis was re-elected secretary-treasurer, a post he has held since 1956 and for 16 consecutive years before that with the state CIO.

Resolutions on subjects ranging from public transportation to anti-strikebreaking legislation were adopted by the convention. The only proposal turned down called for enlargement of the council's community services committee and appointment of a full-time director of community services.

Identical resolutions backing legislation to provide financial assistance to the St. Louis and Kansas City area mass transit systems and opposing any further fare increases were approved by the delegates.

The convention told its leadership to step up efforts to secure passage of an act to regulate the importation of strikebreakers into Missouri.

Symington, speaking at the convention's dinner session, attacked the Nixon Administration's efforts to halt inflation. He cited the rise in unemployment and the housing industry slump and said:

"Yet despite this Administration's harsh restrictive policies, the inflationary spiral continues upward at a current rate of 4 to 5 percent. It would appear that this deliberately engineered recession, with its terrible cost to the people, may have been in vain."

COPE endorsed incumbents in all but two of the 10 congressional races in the state. No recommendations were made in the 6th District where incumbent W. R. Hull Jr. (D) faces Republican opposition and in the 7th District where incumbent Durward G. Hall (R) is unopposed.

"We couldn't see our way clear to support them," Davis said. "Their records are so conservative."

Democratic incumbents in the eight other districts who were endorsed are William Clay, James W. Symington, Mrs. Leonor K. Sullivan, William J. Randall, Richard Bolling, Richard Ichord, William L. Hungate and Bill D. Burlison.

Senate Rollcall Vote on Direct Vote Filibuster

A 53-34 majority of the Senate voted on Sept. 29 in favor of halting a filibuster that has prevented action on a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and allow the American people to elect the President by direct vote.

The effort to limit debate failed, however, because it did not receive the two-thirds majority required by Senate rules.

Labor supported the position of the 34 Democrats and 19 Republicans who voted to end the filibuster. Opposed were 15 Democrats and 19 Republicans.

Rail Accident Bill Passed:

Senate Unit Clears Job Safety Measure

A union-supported Occupational Health & Safety bill won a 13-3 endorsement from the Senate Labor Committee. A companion bill has already been approved by the House Labor Committee and cleared for a floor vote by the Rules Committee.

Meanwhile, a rail safety bill strongly supported by transportation unions moved to the White House and is expected to be signed into law by the President.

It would give the Dept. of Transportation clearcut authority to regulate all areas of railroad safety, including authority to seek court injunctions for immedate correction of serious hazards.

Existing federal rail safety laws cover only about 5 percent of the causes of accidents, railroad union sources said. The new legislation preserves the right of states to enforce more stringent safety rules and allows the states to act against violations of the federal law if the Dept. of Transportation fails to enforce its regulations.

A House-Senate conference committee adopted the $2,500 fine for each violation provided in the original House bill, rather than the $1,000 penalty of the Senate version.

While the rail safety bill had strong bipartisan support, the broader occupational health and safety legislation still faces heavy opposition in both the House and Senate, where floor amendments will be proposed to weaken the committee bills.

Employer groups, which were strong enough to block congressional action during the Johnson Administration, are adamantly opposed to a strong federal safety role. Their fall-back position is support for Administration amendments that would severely limit the powers of the Secretary of Labor and set up "independent" boards to establish standards.

House Democratic leaders, in an apparent effort to avoid a controversial vote before the election, put off action on the safety-health bill until an anticipated "lame-duck" post-election session.

Although the Senate leadership is still on public record for completion of the session by Oct. 15, a post-election reconvening of Congress increasingly appears the only alternative to ditching major legislation in mid-stream.

The Senate's occupational health and safety bill, steered through committee by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), is designed to reduce the annual toll of 15,000 industrial deaths and 2.5 million on-the-job disabling injuries.

In a modification designed to nullify scare tactics used by employer groups to oppose the bill, the Senate committee required that a Labor Dept. inspector receive approval from a superior before using emergency powers to shut down a plant under extreme conditions of "imminent danger."

The Senate bill would establish a new national institute to conduct research, particularly in the occupational health field, and make recommendations to the Secretary of Labor for federal standards.

It also would set up a National Commission on Workmen's Compensation Laws "in order to determine if such laws provide an adequate, prompt and equitable system of compensation for injury or death rising out of or in the course of employment." The commission would report its findings to Congress.

Failure to Limit Debate Stalls Electoral Reform

The Senate gave up—temporarily, at least—its effort to vote on a House-passed constitutional amendment that would abolish the Electoral College and substitute direct election of the President.

A conservative coalition opposed to electoral reform refused to allow the Senate to vote on the proposed constitutional change, or on any of the many alternative plans that various senators had proposed.

Two efforts were made to muster the two-thirds vote required by the Senate's rules to limit debate and break a filibuster.

Both times, the majority for cloture fell short of the required two-thirds.

The constitutional amendment was then temporarily set aside and the Senate turned to other legislation. But Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chief sponsor of electoral reform, said he will continue behind-the-scene efforts to work out a compromise that would win over some of the opponents of the House-passed amendments.

Several senators who opposed cloture have objected primarily to the requirement for a runoff election if no presidential ticket received at least 40 percent of the vote. And Bayh said he will join in an effort to develop an alternative to the runoff.

The final vote for cloture was 53-34, five short of the two-thirds mark. (Rollcall, Page 7.)

Democrats voted 34-15 to limit debate. Even though the electoral reform amendment had the endorsement of Pres. Nixon and Senate GOP leaders, Republicans split 19-19 on the cloture vote.

The AFL-CIO supported the direct election amendment, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany personally testified in its behalf.

But it was supported also by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce as well as groups such as the League of Women Voters. The Chamber, in a letter to all senators, stressed the same point labor had made, that direct popular election of the President "is the only method which provides an equal vote for all citizens and which guarantees victory to the candidate with the most votes nationwide."

Steelworkers' Official Joseph Angelo Dies

Austintown, O.—Joseph Angelo, district director in Los Angeles for the Steelworkers, was buried after services here. He died at 56 of a heart attack while waiting to board a plane for Washington and the start of National Can Co. negotiations.

Angelo was a Pittsburgh native who began work in the mills in his teens. A veteran of the Little Steel Strike of 1937, Angelo was named a USWA staff representative in 1941 and in 1943 helped organize West Coast plants. He was elected a district director 18 months ago.

FREE TRADE UNIONS could be eroded as a force for "evolution toward a more open society" in Latin America as a result of Pres. Nixon's "investment banker" approach to aiding Latin nations, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne declares. Beirne spoke to graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development at Georgetown University.

Nixon's Latin American Aid Plan Seen Weakening Efforts of Unions

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne attacked the Administration's "investment banker" approach to the problem of aiding Latin America nations.

Beirne took note of Pres. Nixon's Sept. 15 message to Congress putting "heavy emphasis on aid funneled through governments," which could "spell disaster for the social dimensions of progress" in the Latin nations.

This type of foreign aid, Beirne suggested, could fail to reinforce "popular elements, such as the free trade unions, as catalysts for evolution toward a more open society."

He made his charges in an address to graduates of the fourth labor economics program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development at Georgetown University.

At the same time, Beirne welcomed Nixon's call for the building of self-reliant and productive societies in the lower-income countries and his reference to the opportunity for social development afforded by foreign aid.

Beirne, who is president of the Communications Workers and serves as chairman of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Committee and secretary-treasurer of the AIFLD, said that achievement of these goals requires:

- Real, not token, participation by U.S. labor in development aid programs.
- Funding of U.S. aid programs at a realistic level.
- The allotting of 1 percent of the U.S. gross national product to foreign assistance programs.

Beirne listed ten priority objectives for the Seventies through which Latin American labor movements might help their peoples:

1. An improvement in "the quality of life . . . for working people" through improved economic and social welfare benefits.

2. A greater voice for free organized labor in economic and social planning.

3. Increased effectiveness by labor movements at every level—local, regional and national.

4. An intensified effort to build the membership of trade unions, with emphasis on development of rural unions.

5. Strengthening of every aspect of union structure with improvement of negotiating skills essential to "the cornerstone of workers' freedom," collective bargaining.

6. Continued growth of leadership training and other union education programs.

7. Expansion of union community service programs—worker and campesino credit unions and cooperatives, day care centers, urban and rural medical and dental services, environmental and consumer protection including legal aid, counseling and other forms of social assistance.

8. Broader development of manpower training and job placement programs. (AIFLD, building on experience gained in cooperative efforts with the unions of Guyana, is planning other skill-training and job-placement programs geared to specific local or national needs).

9. Strengthening of trade union capabilities in economic research and analysis, and the provision of economic and legal counseling services for labor movements. (Toward this end, AIFLD will continue its training programs for labor economists.)

10. Improvement in the ability of Latin American labor movements to communicate viewpoints and policies to the public, government and employers and to the media.

In the graduation address, George H. Hildebrand, Deputy Under Secretary of Labor for international affairs, called on the graduating labor economists to play "the conscience" of their nations' development process.

Their role in the "human development" of Latin America, he said, is to provide the data, "statistics to light the way" toward solutions of social and economic problems.

And this information must be shared "in support of . . . collective bargaining," he added. Toward this end, Hildebrand cited the need for improved "regular dissemination of data among the various trade unions and labor economists . . . of the Americas."

Spokesman for the 14-member class from nine Latin nations, Juan Carlos Gomez Ochoa of Argentina, called on his fellow trade unionist students to "struggle for a sweeping reform of . . . economic structures" so that the wealth produced may "fulfill human needs and solve social problems." Yet he eschewed violent means, saying, "Progress cannot take place in an atmosphere of chaos and disorder, but is only brought about by steady and unceasing efforts within an established social order."

USWA Aide Named To Manpower Post

Paul J. Frasser, Jr., a member of the Steelworkers' headquarters staff for 23 years, has been named to the dual jobs of U.S. Manpower Administrator and Deputy Assistant Labor Secretary for Manpower.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said in announcing the appointment that Frasser will direct the government's $2.6 billion program for training and placing the unemployed in jobs.

Frasser succeeds Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., who has been confirmed as Assistant Secretary of Labor for Manpower.

Frasser joined the Steelworkers in a part-time capacity in 1947. He started full-time with the union in 1951 as an associate in the research department. Since 1967 Frasser has been assistant director of the Steelworkers' contracts administration department.

5.5 Percent Rate Highest In Six Years

By John R. Oravec

The Administration cannot duck responsibility for the surge in the nation's unemployment rate to 5.5 percent in September, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

"It is Administration policies that have caused widespread suffering among families of the unemployed, up nearly 2 million since this Administration took over," Meany said.

The Labor Dept. reported that the 5.5 percent level of unemployment in the nation's workforce—up from 5.1 percent in August—is the highest mark in six years.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said there were 4.3 million persons out of work and actively seeking jobs in September. The number of unemployed, which usually declines during September, rose 72,000 last month. After seasonal adjustments, this represented an increase of 375,000 to a total of 4.6 million.

Millions of other workers on the job felt the economic pinch of a reduced workweek that depressed average weekly earnings by 84 cents from the August level of $121.36. The average workweek was down four-tenths of an hour to 36.8 hours.

Meany prodded the White House "to abandon its 'game plan' and adopt a policy that will put America back to work."

When Pres. Nixon took office, the unemployment rate was 3.3 percent. In September 1969 it was 3.8 percent.

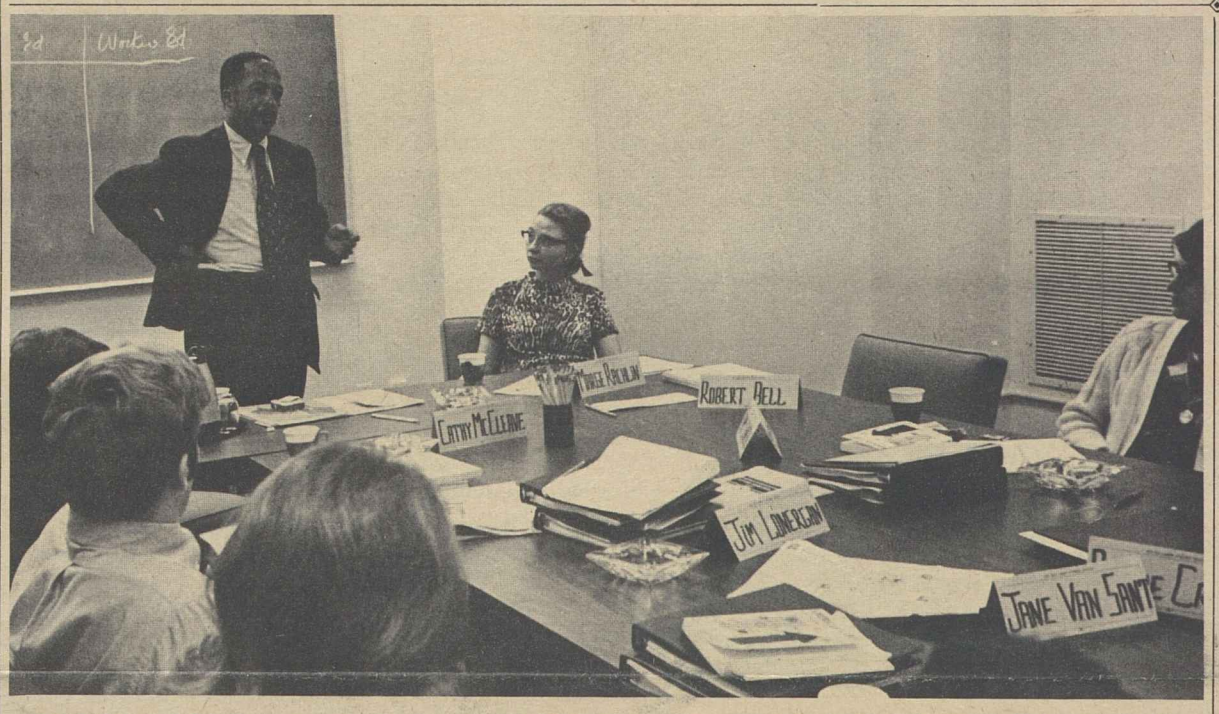
Most severely affected by the rise in joblessness in September were younger workers, mainly in the 16 to 24 age group.

For men 20-24 years old the rate jumped from 8.5 percent in August to 11 percent, the highest since July 1961.



For teenagers, the rate edged up to 16.8 percent from 15.9 percent in August. The September mark is the highest since January 1965.

The BLS speculated that the surge in unemployment for younger workers occurred because many had been still counted in the workforce while waiting to return to school for the fall term.

On this basis alone, the unemployment rate could drop in October. But Harold Goldstein, as-

Meany Asks Bargaining For All Federal Workers

STAFF INTERNS in the AFL-CIO headquarters training progam hear federation Education Dir. Walter G. Davis discuss labor's role in public and worker education at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. The interns were given a two-week course at the center on the issues and challenges confronting labor. (Story, Page 8.)

Spells Out Principles of New System

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called for creation of a nationwide system of collective bargaining between the federal government and unions representing federal employes.

Federation Pres. George Meany said the time has come to extend to all federal workers the collective bargaining principles written into the law which set up the new U.S. Postal Service.

He urged the Administration to join in proposing such legislation to Congress—as it did earlier this year for the postal service.

Meany and other union witnesses testified before the Federal Labor Relations Council, the Cabinet-level panel set up under a presidential executive order to administer the government's union-management relations program and make recommendations for changes.

All three panel members were present for Meany's testimony—Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert E. Hampton, who heads the council; Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, and George P. Shultz, director of the White House Office of Management & Budget.

Meany told the panel that AFL-CIO unions representing federal workers have agreed on the following "basic principles" for a collective bargaining program embracing both the government's salaried white-collar employes and its hourly-paid, blue-collar workers:

- Sitting on the labor side of the bargaining table would be "a five-

Legislation Backed Up:

Congress Schedules Lame-Duck Session

Congressmen and senators will return to Washington after the election—winners and losers alike—to tackle a mountain of major legislation still awaiting final action.

House and Senate leaders agreed to recess on Oct. 14 so that members seeking re-election can give full time to the political campaign. But Congress will return Nov. 16 for a rare "lame duck" post-election session. New members elected on Nov. 3 cannot take office until January, when the 92nd Congress convenes.

Both the House and Senate were grinding out legislation at a fast pace in the days before the recess. But final action on a number of major bills is not scheduled until after the election.

Social security improvements, House action on occupational health and safety, the family assistance welfare reform bill and foreign trade legislation have all been put off until the November session. And while the House is expected to pass the manpower training-public service jobs bill before the recess, final action must wait on a House-Senate conference agreement.

A busy legislative week saw these major developments:

- Congress voted final approval to a mass transit bill to help cities build and improve subway and bus systems. The eventual cost of federal subsidies in the five-year bill is $3.1 billion, but most of it will not be paid out until the final years of the program. However cities will be able to make binding contracts with assurances that the money will be available when payments are due.
- By big, bipartisan majorities, the House passed a strongly-worded anti-crime bill and the Senate approved legislation imposing life sen-

Merchant Ship Bill Hailed on Final Passage

Congress sent to the President—for his certain approval—legislation aimed at launching a 300-vessel merchant fleet during the next 10 years, built in U.S. yards, flying the American flag, and staffed by U.S. seamen.

The labor-supported legislation was hailed as opening a new era in U.S. maritime history and halting the steady decline of American-flag shipping on the high seas.

It extends to all ship operators the right to qualify for construction subsidies, which previously had been limited to berth-line shipping following scheduled trade routes. And it also greatly expands operat-

Senate Urged to Pass Job Safety Bill Intact

America's workers consider the Occupational Safety & Health bill the "most important" legislation before Congress and want to see it passed without destructive changes, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said.

In a letter sent to every senator, Meany stressed the importance of being present for the debate and vote on the Senate bill, scheduled for Oct. 12.

"Organized labor regards this legislation as indispensable to the lives, safety and health of every American worker," Meany declared.

Senators also received strong endorsements of the job safety bill from Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and from a group of prominent scientists, environmental health experts and public figures.

The trade union movement's "strong and enthusiastic support," Meany made clear, is reserved for the bill sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.) and approved by the Senate Labor Committee.

He lambasted the "Administration-Big Business substitute bill" introduced by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) as "weak, inadequate, and an administrative monstrosity."

The Williams bill is fair to employers as well as protective of workers, Meany said.

Its key provisions—the basis for

Political Dollars of Rich Favor Republicans, 13-1

America's richest multimillionaries gave $13 to Republican candidates during the 1968 election year for every $1 contributed to Democratic candidates.

Forty-six super-wealthy individuals—each with a personal fortune estimated at above $150 million—were listed on official campaign expense reports as having made political contributions.

They gave $1,377,313 to Republican candidates and $196,488 to Democrats.

The authoritative Congressional Quarterly magazine, which published the breakdown, noted that "these figures must be considered the minimum contribution for each individual" since loopholes in the reporting laws allow many political donations to go unrecorded.

The biggest individual spender on the list—New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller—put most of his donations into his own unsuccessful campaign for the Republican presidential nomination. That accounted for $356,000 out of the $483,500 he reported in political donations.

AFFILIATION AWARD of the AFL-CIO is presented by Federation Pres. George Meany to Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers at the union's convention in Miami Beach. URW Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold is at the left. The award is given to national and international unions that have 80 percent of their locals affiliated with AFL-CIO state central bodies.

the AFL-CIO's strong support—assign "full responsibility" for establishment and enforcement of job safety and health standards to the Secretary of Labor.

That's where it belongs, Meany stressed.

"The Dept. of Labor was created by Congress to protect the legitimate interests of American workers. Certainly, health and safety on the job fall under this heading."

By contrast, Meany said, the Administration bill "would break up and isolate what should be an integrated program into three segments—each completely independent of the other in decision making."

There would be one board to set standards, a separate enforcement appeal commission "which is really a court except in name," and leave the inspection responsibility as "a sop to the Secretary of Labor."

Through this cumbersome procedure, Meany suggested, "management control" would be achieved and the goals of the legislation thwarted.

Meany sharply refuted Administration claims that it has sought to "compromise" on the bill, but has been rebuffed.

"The Administration has never compromised except on fringe issues," he retorted. Its only substantive change has been to establish two boards instead of one for standard-setting and enforcement.

"If that is compromise," Meany said, "I do not understand the meaning of the word."

His letter, Meany told senators, represents an effort "to convey to you the urgency with which workers and their families look to you for support of the Williams bill. Its passage will be the first great step in the nation's history toward a safe and healthy work place."

Abel termed the showdown vote in the Senate "a day of truth" which will determine whether large groups of workers "live in health, indeed, whether they live at all."

The difference between the Williams bill and the "so-called compromise," Abel emphasized, "is not a mere difference in words or theory" but the difference between "effective" legislation and "foot-dragging, evasion and indecision."

The scientists' letter, issued by Environmental Action, said the Williams bill and the companion House bill by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) are long overdue.

America's workers "spend an average of 40 hours a week in some of the most polluted, physically hazardous and psychically devastating environments found anywhere," they told the Senate.

Signers of the letter included former Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz and former Interior Sec. Stuart Udall as well as biologists, environmental research scientists and university professors.

The Senate vote will be the first big congressional test of the legislation. The House is scheduled to take up the companion bill after the election recess.

Outreach Helps 6,900 Youths Enter Crafts

More than 6,900 minority youths are now apprenticed to one of the 18 building and construction trades unions throughout the Apprenticeship Outreach programs.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson reports that in the year ended last June 30, the building trades recruited 3,052 new apprentices through the Outreach programs.

Apprenticeship Outreach uses the "tutor and cram" technique to assist minority youth (Negro, Mexican-American, Puerto Rican, Indian and Oriental) in preparing for specific apprenticeship examinations.

The courses run from four to 10 weeks, depending on the type of test to be given and each trainee's individual needs.

The AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept. have taken a leading role in Operation Outreach, working closely with the Urban League and the Workers Defense League.

The building and construction trades councils operate 26 projects in 27 cities, the Urban League 29 projects in 32 cities and the WDL 16 projects in 17 cities.

Altogether 10 different sponsoring groups are participating in Operation Outreach with 78 programs.

Among the 18 building and construction trades, five trades account for 3,918 apprentices drawn from Outreach projects or more than 56.6 percent of the total. They are: Carpenters, 1,410 apprentices; Electricians, 746; Plumbers and Pipefitters, 643; Painters, 633; and Sheet Metal Workers, 486.

Shift Convention Schedule:

Rubber Workers' Delegates Focus on Election, Imports

By Eugene A. Kelly

Miami Beach—The Rubber Workers wound up their 27th convention with a strong statement urging congressional action to combat the exportation of American jobs to low-wage countries.

The delegates also looked beyond the convention to spur an all-out membership effort to elect labor-endorsed candidates in the November election.

The convention returned Pres. Peter Bommarito for his third term by a vote of 1,478 to 200 for F. E. Farrington, president of URW Local 44, Los Angeles. It was the first contested presidential election in 10 years. Re-elected without a contest were Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold and Vice Pres. Kenneth Oldham along with 14 other executive board members.

By a rollcall vote of 1,296 to 407, the delegates changed the constitutional provision on conventions and terms of office. They approved a board recommendation that:

- Beginning next year, local union officers will be elected for three-year terms instead of the present two years.
- After the 1972 convention, the union will hold conventions at three-year intervals instead of every two years.
- Starting with the 1972 convention, officers of the international union will be elected for three-year terms instead of two years.

URW board members proposed the change, they told delegates, to make sure that URW conventions, local union elections and companywide negotiations do not fall in the same year, as they did in 1970. The change will benefit union negotiators, they said.

On the fifth and last day of the convention, delegates were preparing to refer all remaining unfinished business to the executive board when two delegates succeeded in getting action on a foreign trade policy statement.

"I am here as a delegate from Uniroyal Local 224, Woonsocket, R.I., for the last time," declared Pres. Norman Thibeault of that local. "We got the news a few weeks ago that our jobs have been destroyed by foreign imports. Our plant is closing" because of a flood of cheap footwear admitted into the United States, Thibeault said.

Through action by the URW and the AFL-CIO, the plant employes will get up to a maximum of $85 a week under legislation supported by labor and passed by Congress for temporary relief. But "we don't want relief, we want jobs," said delegates. They reported plant closings also in Watertown, Mass., Mishawaka, Ind., and other locations.

The convention voted unanimously to ask Congress to negoiate trade agreements with other nations and to regulate job-destroying imports in the United States and Canada.

In other action, the delegates called on all segments of labor to "make this year's register-and-vote drive the best in labor history." They denounced the indictment of the Seafarers for collecting voluntary campaign fund donations for political candidates as a "device to silence unions" and deter union members from doing what the law allows them to do.

URW COPE Dir. Francis Maile reported that his committee has collected $43,000 for AFL-CIO political action so far this year, and hopes to make it $50,000. The $43,000 collection is the biggest in URW history, he said, noting also that 1970 is the biggest year for strikes to date.

The convention endorsed a bill by Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.) to reduce industrial accidents and improve safety in the workplace.

The officers announced that committees will be set up soon to produce recommendations on better methods of successful bargaining and strike financing. Directors are being named in seven union districts, they said, to conduct training programs for local union officers and negotiators as a move to strengthen union educational methods.

Introduced to the convention as a hero was Delegate Steve Seleski of Local 2, Akron, who rescued a swimmer caught in the ocean undertow and swept nearly a mile down the oceanfront to the convention hotel beach.

Bommarito reported that Armstrong Rubber Co., whose 5,000 workers have been on strike since July 1 at West Haven, Conn., Des Moines, Iowa, Natchez, Miss., and Hanford, Calif., discontinued hospital and surgical insurance coverage for employes and 500 pensioners Sept. 29. The insurance carrier refused to extend coverage or accept payment from the union, and some hospitals refused to admit patients covered by the plan, Bommarito said.

Coverage was continued, he reported when union officers sent a $50,000 first payment to another carrier—Nationwide Insurance Co.—which agreed to cover all strikers and retirees. The incident shows the value of extending coverage for even longer periods than the 90-day extension at Armstrong, he declared.

Pilots Renew Demand For Cockpit Safeguards

The Air Line Pilots Association has renewed a demand that the federal government require bulletproof cockpit doors and bulkheads on major airliners as part of the drive to curb air piracy.

ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby, in an appeal to the Federal Aviation Administration, noted that the union "has endorsed the secure cockpit concept for several years and wants action now" in view of the increase in hijacking of aircraft.

The Pilots are asking for a bulletproof partition separating the cockpit from the cabin, a bulletproof door with an electro-magnetic-type lock, a bulletproof window and a sliding panel in the door.

These features, Ruby emphasized, would permit cockpit crews to have face-to-face confrontation with prospective hijackers in an attempt to disuade them, while at the same time allow the crews to maintain their own security.

"Without the equipment to protect themselves," Ruby said, "crews have had no choice but to allow intruders with hostages to enter the flight deck."

The Administration's decision to use armed federal guards on airplanes, Ruby said, makes "bulletproofing" more important than ever because "the possibility of gunfire in the cabin has increased, and it is likely that bullets from the cabin may accidentally enter the flight deck."

With materials and technology to carry out the union's proposal "currently available and relatively inexpensive," Ruby said, "ALPA would view as unacceptable any half-way proposal to install improved viewing windows and locks on existing non-bulletproof doors."

"Those who would deny the crew the right and the equipment to protect themselves and their passengers must also accept the responsibility for the inevitable disasters," he added.

Legislative Goals Set By Minnesota Labor

Duluth, Minn.—A wide-ranging 1971 state legislative program was established by the 13th convention of the Minnesota AFL-CIO.

The 758 delegates adopted 31 resolutions calling for laws or changes in laws to provide, among other things:

- Collective bargaining for agricultural employes.
- A state minimum wage of $2 an hour.
- Legalization of pari-mutuel betting in Minnesota.
- Mandatory instruction in labor history at all levels of the public school system.
- Changes in financial laws affecting consumers, including the requirement that lending institutions pay interest on funds held in escrow, and the prohibition of debt pooling.

On the political front, delegates endorsed seven candidates for state-wide public office, including former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, the Democratic Farmer-Labor candidate for the U.S. Senate, and State Sen. Wendell Anderson, the DFL candidate for governor.

The delegates also endorsed all congressional candidates recommended by district Committees on Political Education including incumbent Democrats Joseph Karth from the state's 4th District, Donald Fraser from the 5th, and John Blatnik from the 8th, and DFL candidates Robert Berglund from the 7th, Terry Montgomery from the 6th, George Rice from the 3rd, and Clifford R. Adams from the 2nd.

Referred to the executive council of the state AFL-CIO for further study were resolutions calling for collective bargaining for public employes, legalization of "insure-yourself" or "no-fault" auto insurance, and drafting of comprehensive new unemployment and workmen's compensation bills for submission to the Minnesota legislature.

High Stakes Stressed:

Steelworkers Spur '70 Election Drive

Atlantic City—The Steelworkers zeroed in on the high stakes of the Nov. 3 election while stressing the union's basic objectives in bargaining and organizing for the Seventies.

Crucial to labor's legislative goals is the election of more liberals to Congress, the 3,500 delegates to the 15th USWA convention agreed. And all-out support was pledged to labor-endorsed candidates as the convention's political action resolution called attention to the "anti-labor direction" of the Nixon Administration.

USWA Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke said that labor has lost the Executive Branch of the federal government and that the Judicial Branch is slipping way. He warned that voters will determine on Nov. 3 whether labor and liberal interests will lose the Legislative Branch.

The delegates vowed in the resolution to raise funds for labor's friends to offset the "massive money raising campaign of our enemies" and to cooperate fully with COPE registration and voter drives.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland cited the defeat of liberal Democratic Sen. Ralph Yarborough in the Texas primary as part of a concerted effort by labor's adversaries to pick off its friends in Congress.

"That story must not be repeated in other states on Nov. 3," Kirkland declared. He further warned:

"Much more is at stake than mere delay in passing important pieces of progressive legislation. Defeat would bring a flood of regressive legislation that could reverse everything we have accomplished over generations. We could lose through legislation much of what we have won at the bargaining table.

"If the conservatives pick off our friends in Congress one by one this year, business will almost certainly try to pick off our unions one by one next year."

Kirkland noted that anti-union legislation has already been introduced in Congress.

"There are bills to ban unions from any kind of political activity and bills to outlaw the union shop in government and industry and to wreck the progress the farm workers have made in their long struggle for justice and recognition," he observed.

While the labor movement cannot match the money its opponents raise for their campaigns, Kirkland declared that labor's foes cannot equal the efforts of unions to get voters registered and bring them to the polls.

Arthur J. Goldberg, former USWA legal counsel and now Democratic candidate for governor of New York, told the convention that the November election will be a crucial referendum on the Nixon-Agnew Administration.

Goldberg held the Administration responsible for high unemployment and soaring prices. He also charged that it was attempting to stack the National Labor Relations Board with management representatives and had tried earlier to break the United Farm Workers' strike through the Pentagon's purchases of non-union grapes.

Legislative goals adopted by the Steelworkers include:

- Passage of the occupational health and safety bill now before Congress.
- Establishment of "reasonable import quotas" for steel.
- A government guarantee of pension benefits if employers fail to meet obligations.
- Adoption of the labor-backed national health insurance system.
- Expansion of anti-pollution laws for clean air and waterways.

The convention also resolved as as a key bargaining objective to seek guaranteed salaries for members over the full term of USWA contracts.

Pres. I. W. Abel said the union has made progress toward securing a guaranteed annual wage for members. Guaranteed wages are needed because of "hazards of economic conditions" and "hazards of industrial accident, injury and sickness," he stressed.

Increased efforts to organize white collar workers throughout the industries covered by the union were pledged in another resolution. It noted that "thousands of office and technical employes within our jurisdiction" lack union representation.

Delegates decisively rejected a resolution intended, its sponsors said, to bring racial minorities and women into the USWA executive board by creating additional offices that would initially be filled by appointment and later by election.

Abel said he and other union officers wanted qualified minority members on the board, but opposed shortcircuiting of the election process.

The first salary increases for top USWA officers since 1956 were approved. Delegates voted a $10,000 annual increase for Abel, boosting his salary to $60,000. Raises of $7,500 each were granted to Burke and Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, increasing their pay to $42,500 a year.

The 25 USWA district directors received a $5,000 increase to $25,000 a year. This was the first raise in pay for the directors since 1964.

State Job Agencies Hit On Failure to Aid Needy

Salt Lake City—Administrators of state employment services were told at their national conference here that the AFL-CIO doesn't think their agencies are doing an effective job "in reaching out to the dropouts, the aged, the underemployed, the minorities and the disadvantaged."

The criticism came from Julius Rothman, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs and president of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute. The occasion was the 34th annual meeting of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies.

Rothman told the employment service officials that more, not less, federal direction is needed to meet the job needs of workers as well as employers.

"Traditionally," he charged, "the state employment services have been employer-oriented rather than worker-oriented."

Commenting on Administration efforts to turn over manpower programs to the 50 states, Rothman said "the AFL-CIO sees no advantage to fragmenting manpower activities into 50 different parts."

Labor's position, he stressed, has been federalization of the employment service.

"Our stand is based on the simple fact that we live in a national interdependent economy," Rothman said. "Employers operate across state lines; labor markets and product markets are not hemmed in by geographical boundaries. And the recent national census underscores the mobility of the American worker."

While convinced of the need for a federalized employment service, Rothman said, "until this is achieved, the AFL-CIO will continue to prod the Labor Dept. to set higher performance standards for the state agencies along with significant upgrading in function."

Rothman told the group that the "modest improvements" Congress has made in the unemployment insurance system fall "far short" of what is needed.

The legislation won't take full effect until 1972, he noted. Yet "high levels of unemployment and sharply increased unemployment insurance exhaustion rates are current economic realities."

And even after 1972, unless further action is taken, "the nation will still be saddled with an outdated unemployment insurance system which continues to perpetuate rather than alleviate poverty."

He stressed that "after 35 years of experience with the program, America still lacks universal coverage of all wage and salary workers; standards establishing reasonable qualifying requirements and limitations on unreasonable disqualifications, and the financing of the program is woefully inadequate."

Rothman reaffirmed "the AFL-CIO's long-standing view on the need for minimum federal benefit standards."

He termed such standards "the essential federal legislation needed to establish a meaningful unemployment insurance system for the nation's jobless workers."

Farm Workers Sign 2 Tomato Growers

Salinas, Calif.—Two major California tomato growers have negotiated contracts with the United Farm workers Organizing Committee after rescinding their contracts with the Teamsters union.

UFWOC's drive to represent farm workers also advanced in the strawberry fields when negotiations started in San Francisco with the largest California strawberry grower, Pic'N Pac, a subsidiary of the S. S. Pierce Co. of Boston.

New attempts are also being made to break the deadlock in negotiations between UFWOC and two large lettuce growers in the Salinas Valley, Freshpict Foods and D'arrigo Bros. Co.

Auxiliary Bishop Joseph E. Donnelly of Hartford, Conn., head of the Catholic Bishops' committee on farm labor, arrived in Salinas Oct. 6 to act as a mediator.

But UFWOC suffered two setbacks in the courts when several supermarket chains obtained restraining orders limiting picketing of their stores. The picketing is part of the national lettuce boycott called by Cesar Chavez against all lettuce not picked under UFWOC contracts.

The two tomato firms reaching an agreement with UFWOC are Brown & Hill, which has 1,000 acres near King City, and the Meyer Tomato Co., largest tomato grower in the state with farms as far south as the Imperial Valley.

On piece rates tomato pickers will get 2 cents more per bucket than under the Teamster contract and 25 cents more per hour under the hourly wage. The new rates are 20 cents a bucket and $2.50 an hour.

Pic'N Pac negotiations started after UFWOC initiated a boycott of S. S. Pierce products. Pic'N Pac had signed a contract with the Teamsters, but a card check just conducted showed that its field workers are members of UFWOC. The firm employs more than 1,000 at peak harvest time.

Superior court judges in both Bakersfield and Los Angeles placed restrictions on picketing by UFWOC. Los Angeles Judge Richard Schauer did so at the request of Alpha Beta, Market Basket and Thrifty Mart markets. Bakersfield Judge George A. Brown did so at the request of Safeway, Lucky, Purity, Quality Foods Inc. and two southern California chains.

Moskow Named Director Of Bargaining Panel

The appointment of Michael H. Moskow as executive director of the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission was announced by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson.

Moskow, senior staff economist with the Council of Economic Advisers, succeeds James L. Macpherson, who is returning to Cleveland as regional director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Burdick Cited For Support of Labor's Goals

Bismarck — Delegates to the North Dakota AFL-CIO convention unanimously endorsed Sen. Quentin Burdick in his bid for re-election against Rep. Thomas Kleppe.

A strong statement that outlined labor's concerns, such as medical care and inflation, concluded that Burdick "shares these same concerns . . . and has exerted every effort for working men and women of the state, for the farmer and for the small businessmen."

The three-day convention was devoted largely to plans for the November election. Also endorsed by the convention delegates were two Democratic candidates for congress, James Brooks and Art Link.

Typical of the resolutions adopted were those calling for state hearings on wages for housekeeping occupation, hearings on minimum wage orders of the state labor commissioner, and repeal of the compulsory open shop law in the state.

One major reorganization change occurred at the meeting. North Dakota has now five central bodies, but an informal central body exists in one other city and progress is being made toward establishment of central bodies in two other cities.

The state constitution was changed to permit an additional member on the executive board for the coming year, and delegates indicated support for adding two more representatives when the additional central bodies are organized.

Gov. William L. Guy addressed the convention banquet.

Credit Union Assets Total $369 Million

Madison, Wis.—Total assets of more than 1,171 credit unions sponsored by labor organizations amounted to $369 million at the end of 1969, the 1970 International Credit Union Yearbook shows. Loans outstanding at the end of the year totaled $321 million.

More that 689,000 union members belong to labor-sponsored credit unions, according to the yearbook published by CUNA International, Inc. Millions of union members belong to credit unions under other sponsorship.

Overall, credit unions in the United States reported assets of more than $15 billion, with savings of more than $13 billion and loans outstanding of nearly $13 billion, the CUNA yearbook disclosed.

Paying for Stability

ON FEB. 19, 1969, Pres. Nixon wrote AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany during a meeting of the Federation's Executive Council: "We must find ways to curb inflation, which robs working men and women and their families of hard-earned gains. And we must do this without asking the wage earners to pay for the cost of stability with their jobs."

On Oct. 2, 1970, Meany issued a statement on the release of the latest government figures on unemployment. He said:

"It is Administration policies that have caused widespread suffering among families of the unemployed, up nearly two million since this Administration took over. It is time for the White House to abandon its 'game plan' and adopt a policy that will put America back to work."

Between February 1969 and October 1970 this is what happened:

● The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate went from 3.3 percent of the labor force in February 1969 to 5.5 percent 20 months later—a 60 percent increase.

● The number of unemployed on a seasonally adjusted basis went from 2.7 million in February 1969 to 4.6 million in September 1970—also a 60 percent increase.

As Meany said in his statement, "the Administration cannot duck responsibility for this tragic statistic."

IN THE INTERVAL between February 1969 and his statement last week, the federation president has commented scores of times on the dangerously rising unemployment and the economic policies that have triggered the situation.

The federation, at meetings of its Executive Council and at its 1969 convention, warned that unless the White House revised its economic policy approach, unemployment would continue to climb and the economy to decline, or at best stay on dead center.

These predictions and forecasts have, unfortunately, proved accurate as the Administration has persisted in allowing the economy to "cool off" at the expense of workers' jobs. The cost of "fighting inflation" has been borne almost completely by workers who have been afflicted by ever-rising living costs while their jobs have been disappearing.

In February 1969, Pres. Nixon wrote: "As we seek new paths to social justice, new ways to enrich our national life, I ask for your counsel and cooperation and for the understanding of the millions you represent."

The AFL-CIO has counselled the President on his economic policies, in vain. It has cooperated at every turn and tried to meet every request, but the Administration has pushed on with its carefully planned program to slow the economy.

The 5.5 percent unemployment figure for September stands as uncontestable evidence of an economic policy that has failed to curb inflation "without asking the wage earners to pay for the cost of stability with their jobs."

A Word Edgewise:

Report Puts Campus Violence Into Proper Historical Context

By John P. Roche

ONE CANNOT HELP but sympathize with the members of the Scranton Commission, which filed its report on campus unrest last week. Against a background of bombing, arson, bank robbing, and the deaths of a California judge and a Boston policeman, all attributed to student extremists, the commission had to walk a high wire.

For weeks, right-wingers on Capitol Hill have been launching pre-emptive strikes at the upcoming report, alleging it would whitewash the students. And on the left, critics were primed to assault any recommendations that did not begin by telling Pres. Nixon to end the war, racism, imperialism, and pollution as a prerequisite for domestic peace.

Predictably, nobody will be happy with the report, but what has to be understood is that the document is not analogous to a medical diagnosis of, say, the causes of malaria. In effect, the nine members were asked to do a careful study of the very nature of American society in 1970, using the problems of campus unrest as the focus of their investigation.

Now this is my business. For almost a quarter of a century I have been writing and teaching about that strange, wonderful, yet often terrifying amalgam we call "American civilization." In particular, in studying the development of civil liberties in America, I have spent an enormous amount of time exploring the other side of the moon: our darker past, the treatment of ethnic minorities, trade union organizers, abolitionists, and other dissenters by their militant neighbors. In short, I consider myself an expert on violence in American life.

I confess I turned to the Scranton Report with deep misgivings, fortified by my experience with the Kerner Commission, which Pres. Johnson set up in 1967 to investigate the causes of civil disorders, i.e. ghetto riots. That commission did a first-class job of microanalysis, turned in a series of special studies that were extremely valuable, and became famous for a ludicrous historical generalization: that we were "moving towards two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal."

No one in his historical senses could compare the United States in 1900 with the United States in 1968 and reach such an absurd conclusion. In fact, we have been moving away from an openly, militantly racist past towards an egalitarian future. Progress has been appallingly slow, but the direction is unmistakable. As I sat in the White House and read that sentence, I could only meditate sadly on self-inflicted wounds.

Since there has been so much blathering about the historical causes of campus unrest, I was prepared for the worst. Would the Scranton Report endorse the current cliche that "divisive policies" (notably the war in Viet Nam) have triggered student disruptions? Would it assume that campus violence began in America when Berkeley and Columbia were hit? Would it give its imprimatur to the standard lament that this generation of Americans was the first that ever encountered real problems?

I HASTEN to report that, while there are parts of the document that dissatisfy me, the commission has done a fine job of establishing the proper historical context. Probably the single most important point made in this connection was that violence has always been endemic in American society and its colleges and universities except during what I have called the "consensus intermission" that followed our intervention in World War II and lasted until a new generation turned up, that is, in the early 1960s.

Thus events today on campus are strikingly different from what went on in the 1940s and '50s, but (allowing for the fantastic increase in scale arising from mass higher education) have strong parallels with happenings in the 1930s.

The commission's chapter on causes of unrest is, in fact, as solid a reading of the true course of events as I have seen. It downplays the notion of a great conspiracy (though recognizing the fact that there are conspiracies); it casts a cold eye on the persistent theme that the United States is in an advanced state of moral decay; and it is appropriately skeptical of the conventional campus wisdom that war and racism in the society at large have generated rebellion. (After all, Japanese universities have been in a state of siege for years and Japan can hardly be accused of "imperialism" or "racism.")

Our Place in the '70 Campaign

The October 1970 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist carries the following editorial, titled "The Choice Before Us," by Pres. George Meany:

THE AFL-CIO is proud of the legislative record of the 1960s, when the number of Americans living in poverty was cut in half and breakthroughs were scored in civil rights, aid to education and tax reform. But we are not satisfied. We are very concerned about the prospects for the 1970s and the impact of unemployment and inflation on American workers.

The source of most of the breakthroughs of the 1960s was the forward-looking majority we helped elect to Congress along with Lyndon Johnson in 1964. The source of our concern about the 1970s is the conservative coalition, its revived strength and its failure to deal with basic problems.

We cannot tolerate an America in which health care is limited to ability to pay, in which 4.3 million Americans are sacrificed as unemployed in the name of fighting inflation while the banks feast on the highest interest rates since the Civil War; in which any youngster with the capacity to learn is limited in any way in the amount of education available to him; in which 14,500 workers are killed and countless thousands are maimed on the job each year; in which you can be bilked at the marketplace or poisoned by the air you breathe or the water you drink.

We are just as concerned about the household domestic, who has no guarantee of economic security and no protection against unemployment or old age. We are just as concerned about the ghetto youngster with a will to learn and no adequate school to attend; with an eagerness to work and no job available.

These are the kinds of Americans for whom this nation must get moving again; for whom the American dream must be reshaped to blot out the call to violence.

It is to change these conditions that we have taken our place in the 1970 campaigns.

This issue of the Federationist spells out in detail the facts on the issues, the candidates, the problems of registration and voting.

It shows that we have a choice in virtually every one of the 35 Senate, 435 House, 35 governor and thousands of state legislative seats at stake this fall.

We must back these choices with our dollars, with our voices and with our votes. When we do, we will win and so will America.

School Fund Shortage:

Paraprofessionals Face Crisis

By Bayard Rustin

WHEN WE THINK about a school system, we are usually concerned with its ability to perform its primary and vital function—the education of children. But even though this is by far the most important function of schools, it is not their only one. Schools are also important to the millions of adults who work in them. These adults must be well-trained if they are to educate children, and they must also be paid a decent salary if they are to provide for themselves and their families.

The significance of employment in the schools has been underlined by the emergence of a new classification of school personnel—the paraprofessionals. One cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of the paraprofessional program to the schools and to the welfare of our social system. The paraprofessionals tend to be poor and nonwhite, and as such, a vital relationship obtains between themselves on the one hand and the schools and society on the other.

One of the major educational problems of the last few years involves the relationship of the school to the community. This, in a sense, is what the decentralization crisis was all about. The significance of the paraprofessionals in this regard is that they are community people who work in the schools. They can, therefore, serve as a bridge between the community and the school, bringing into the schools their own special knowledge of the community and the children, and reassuring the children that the school is not a foreign environment. Such a contribution is in addition to the specific educational benefits the paraprofessionals provide—among other things, taking some of the burden off the shoulders of overworked teachers, helping with supervision, and in Spanish-speaking areas, serving as interpreters between teacher and pupil.

What must also be emphasized is the social relevance of the paraprofessional program. In the first place, the program provides jobs for poor people—not dead-end and degrading jobs, but jobs that enable them to make an important contribution to society. Moreover, they are jobs with a future since adult education and a career ladder are built into the paraprofessional program. Thus, poor people who at one time may have had little hope for advancement are now being given the opportunity to re-educate themselves and to play a new and useful role in society.

The tremendous meaning the paraprofessional program has to the paraprofessionals themselves is indicated by a crisis situation that has developed in New York City where thousands of them are being fired due to lack of funds. People whose lives had begun to brighten are now being thrust back into deprivation.

One of the hidden beneficial effects of the present crisis in New York City is that it has united all of the groups concerned about education in support of the paraprofessionals. New York, we should not forget, was the scene of extraordinary conflict over the schools only two years ago. Former enemies are now allies because they have come to realize that they cannot achieve any improvements in the schools if they do not work together.

While their cooperation does not assure salvaging the jobs of the paraprofessionals, it at least offers the prospect of a renewed spirit of common purpose upon which all future progress depends. The New York experience offers an important lesson to people all over the country who are concerned about the quality of education in our schools.

Linked to Industrial Complex:

Marland Hit on Anti-Unionism

CLOSE TIES to the growing educational-industrial complex and reluctance to accept collective bargaining for teachers disqualify Sidney P. Marland, Jr., to head the U.S. Office of Education, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis has charged.

Marland has tried to "play down" his opposition to teacher unionism since Pres. Nixon nominated him for U.S. Commissioner of Education, Davis said. But, he declared, Marland's position "is a matter of record" and has "persisted throughout his entire professional career as an educator."

Davis acknowledged that as Commissioner of Education, Marland would not deal directly with relationships between teachers and school boards. But, he warned, "occasions could arise where his anti-labor bias would show." He cited the "More Effective Schools" programs of the American Federation of Teachers, which is eligible for federal funds in its efforts to improve inner-city schools, as an example.

Pointing out that the Office of Education would have to approve allocation of funds, he said that Marland's views on teacher unionism would make him "less than objective" toward an application from the union.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Davis said the AFL-CIO recognizes that the business community does have "legitimate concerns" in the education field, but Marland's close relationships with "many of the largest corporations in the country" as head of the Institute for Educational Development need a much closer look. He pointed out that federal, state and local expenditures for education now total some $58 billion a year, and are expected to top $90 billion by 1975.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE SENATE appears to be largely in favor of a plan for the direct election of the President of the United States but its prospects of Senate passage this year do not seem particularly bright.

Blocking a vote on the proposal, sponsored by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), is a plain, old-fashioned filibuster by conservatives.

The only way the filibuster can be halted to allow a vote on the issue is the invoking of cloture under Senate Rule 22. This procedure now requires a two-thirds vote. The first move for cloture found 54 senators voting for it and 34 against it—six votes short. The second vote was five votes short.

The measure, which calls for a constitutional amendment and has already been approved by the House of Representatives, has been "temporarily" set aside. There is some question whether there will be another vote in this Congress.

Of course, a two-thirds vote is necessary for a constitutional amendment. Bayh and most impartial observers believe that this could be obtained.

However, there are a sufficient number of senators who hold the filibuster in such sacred regard that they will vote against cloture regardless of the issue involved.

So, once again, it would appear that a minority of the Senate has used the privilege of unlimited debate to frustrate the will of the majority.

Over the years it has usually been southerners and their conservative Republican allies who utilized the filibuster to oppose measures against the poll tax, lynching, literacy tests, and other civil rights legislation.

It was in 1966 that the late Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, the Republican leader of the Senate, led a filibuster to prevent a vote on repeal of Secton 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, the so-called right-to-work section. The House had approved repeal.

Ironically, two of the rare times in recent years when cloture has been effective was in 1964 and 1965 when it led to the passage of civil rights legislation.

RULE 22, which makes cloture possible but rarely probable, has been one of the most hotly controversial guides for the operation of the Senate ever enacted.

Unlimited debate in the Senate was a problem in the early days of this country. In 1801, Vice Pres. Thomas Jefferson, in his "Manual of Parliamentary Procedure," took a dim view of it, declaring: "No one is to speak imperturbably or beside the question, superfluously or tediously."

Yet this usually happens in a filibuster.

The first use of the filbuster was in 1841 when it was put into operation against certain financial bills of Henry Clay. The most famous application of it was in 1917 when it was used against Pres. Wilson's measure to arm merchant ships prior to our entry into World War I.

In fact, it was during the Senate filibuster against the Wilson proposal that Rule 22 was enacted by a vote of 73 to 6. It was invoked again in 1919 when, as Wilson said, "a little group of willful men" tried to talk the Versailles Treaty to death.

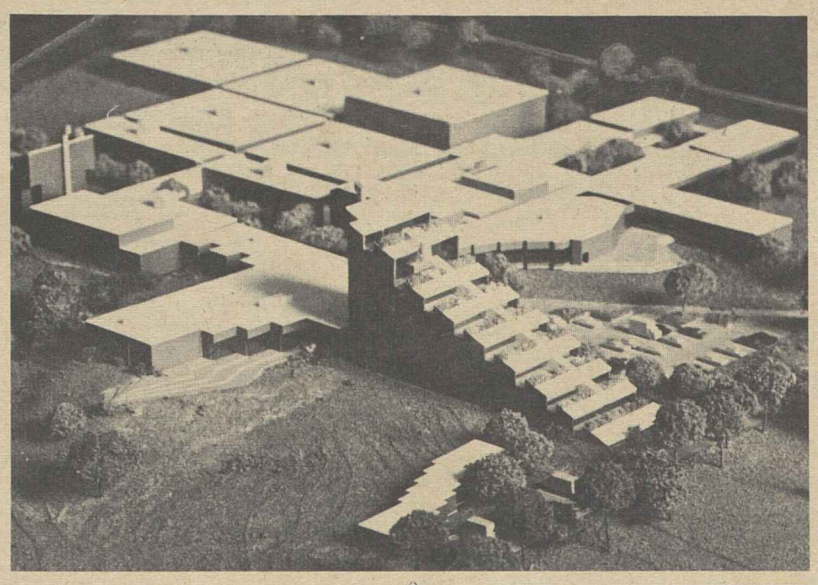
However, the Southern Democratic-Republican coalition from 1938 through 1962 found the filibuster most effective in stopping civil rights legislation.

The word filibuster, itself, has a fascinating background. It is believed that it comes from the Dutch "vry bruiter" meaning freebooter.

In the 17th Century, filibusters were pirates who pillaged the Spanish colonies in the West Indies and preyed on shipping.



At the beginning of each new Congress, liberals seek to ease Rule 22. They will unquestionably try again next January. Whether they will be successful depends entirely on the outcome of the November elections.

ANTI-UNION BIAS and close ties to the industrial-educational complex should rule out Senate confirmation of Dr. Sidney P. Marland, Jr., as U.S. Commissioner of Education, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and John Matthews of the Washington Evening Star. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired Tuesdays over Mutual radio.

TRINITY CHURCH in New York City was the site for the installation of top officers of the Masters, Mates & Pilots. The union's new constitution and by-laws also were dedicated at the church. The ceremony followed a luncheon at which plans were announced for a new Maritime Institute of Technology & Graduate Studies to be built near Baltimore. Development of the training center is part of the joint labor-industry Maritime Advancement Training, Education & Safety (MATES) program. Photo shows an architect's model of the institute.

Deck Officers, Industry Plan Training Institute

New York—The Masters, Mates & Pilots will break ground shortly near Baltimore for a $10 million advanced technology institute to train Amerian merchant marine officers.

Construction of the new Maritime Institute of Technology & Graduate Studies is expected to begin later this month on a 50-acre site a few miles from Baltimore's Friendship International Airport, Pres. Thomas F. O'Callaghan of the MMP announced.

The training center is part of a multi-million dollar effort by the maritime industry and labor to strengthen the position of the American shipping fleet in world competition.

Capt. O'Callaghan said that the institute will be financed entirely by contributions from the "more progressive shipping companies, without government subsidy."

The force behind the development of the institute is the Maritime Advancement, Training, Education & Safety (MATES) program that is the outgrowth of an intensive two-year study of U.S. and foreign flag operations by industry and labor officials, scientists and training specialists.

The first classes for 100 officers of MATES-member shipping lines are scheduled to begin in the fall of 1971, said O'Callaghan, who is also the chairman of MATES.

Speaking at a luncheon in New York where a model of the new institute was displayed, O'Callaghan said that the school will provide deck officers with the most up-to-date training available.

With provisions for private grants and open-end funding, the expansion of the training facility is projected over a 10-year period. Besides the basic training center, the institute's expansion plans call for an oceanographic laboratory, international marine and nautical technological libraries, a maritime museum and a planetarium.

MATES has commissioned the creation of unique training devices is designed to simulate shipboard experiences, the union said.

In addition, the center will make use of in-depth instruction and practice in such technological innovations as shore-based radar control of waterways, automated bridge controls, containerized cargo handling and new communications techniques.

Although the faculty of the center has not yet been named, it is expected to include leaders in shipping, labor, science and business. Initial training will be based on one-month courses.

Following the announcement on the new training institute, ceremonies were held at Trinity Church for the dedication of the new MMP constitution and installation of officers.

Sworn to new one-year terms were Pres. O'Callaghan, Sec.-Treas. Charles M. Crooks and the union's executive board that includes MMP vice presidents and port agents.

2 Shoe Unions Win Pay Gains For 10,000

St. Louis—A jointly negotiated contract by the Boot & Shoe Workers and the United Shoe Workers will boost wages an average of 33 cents an hour over two years for about 10,000 shoe factory employes in four states.

The four-year agreement, which has a wage reopener clause after two years, will go into effect next Dec. 1 for workers at 29 plants operated by Interco's International Shoe Division. The plants are in Arkansas, Illinois, Missouri and Tennessee.

The contract provides for an 18-cent an hour increase this year and a 15-cent boost Dec. 1, 1971. Because of an intricate point system on piece work rates, skilled workers are expected to receive even higher raises, union representatives noted.

A minimum wage scale is also incorporated in the agreement, setting a wage floor of $1.80 this year, $1.85 in October 1971 and $1.90 in April 1972.

Additional improvements were made in pension benefits, medical insurance and hospitalization, the unions reported.

Vermont Labor Endorses Hoff In Senate Race

Burlington, Vt.—Delegates to the Vermont State AFL-CIO convention here gave an enthusiastic ovation—and a unanimous endorsement—to Philip H. Hoff, Democratic candidate for the Senate.

Hoff, the state's former governor, faces incumbent Sen. Winston L. Prouty in the Nov. 3 election. The convention also endorsed State Sen. Leo O'Brien, Jr., in his bid to unseat incumbent Republican Gov. Deane C. Davis.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Ralph E. Williams told the convention that a "voter identification" survey shows that union members and their families could be decisive factors in Vermont elections—if they register and vote. He said labor's voter registration drive will continue right up to the deadline — the Saturday before Election Day.

Williams and Sec.-Treas. Arthur George were re-elected without opposition and delegates picked Robert Clark, a member of the Operating Engineers, as executive vice president to replace Martin Berger, who did not seek re-election.

Resolutions adopted by the convention included a strong endorsement of national health insurance, a call for repeal of a recently-enacted state sales tax, proposals for improvement in workmen's compensation, and approval of lowering the voting age to 18.

Sargent Shriver, former anti-poverty director, Peace Corps head and U.S. ambassador, addressed the convention banquet.

Marland's Nomination Opposed by Teachers

The executive council of the American Federation of Teachers voted unanimous opposition to Senate confirmation of Sidney P. Marland as U.S. Commissioner of Education.

AFT Pres. David Selden said the union will work closely with AFL-CIO central bodies to fight the nomination.

Marland's nomination has been described by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "a threat to the future of public education."

50-Cent Increase Voted:

IBEW Convention Boosts Per Capita

Seattle—Mounting costs of operation and expanded services for members were cited as the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers voted to boost the union's per capita payments to $2 a month.

The 50-cent increase approved by delegates to the 29th IBEW convention is the first raise since 1962. The $2 rate will become effective next Jan. 1.

In its recommendation for the boost, the convention's law committee noted that the IBEW locals and systems councils are demanding increased services. More staff members will have to be added to headquarters offices and field operations, it added.

The committee also pointed out that the IBEW headquarters will be moving to expanded new quarters because it has outgrown the facilities occupied for the last 40 years.

The convention re-elected without opposition the top union officers to new four-year terms. They are Pres. Charles H. Pillard, Sec. Joseph D. Keenan and Treas. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr.

Eleven of the 12 vice presidents were also re-elected. In the seventh district, which embraces Arizona, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas, Raymond Duke unseated incumbent A. E. Edwards.

In the election for the IBEW executive council, T. H. Pursley and Harry Bexley were selected over incumbents Joseph C. Epperson and A. W. Schmidt. The seven other council members, including chairman E. J. Fransway, were re-elected.

The convention, in a resolution, called for continuing drive to gain wage increases in keeping with their skills for IBEW members employed on the Nation's railroads.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), in an address to the delegates, urged the IBEW to throw its support behind candidates in the coming elections "who have taken a real interest in labor and have demonstrated it by their records."

He called on delegates to "make a special effort to see to it that we elect to office those people who are dedicated to the best interests of our country—at home and abroad."

Jackson laid the nation's domestic economic problems in the lap of the Administration as he noted the impact on workers of rising unemployment, inflation, and excessively high interest rates.

"You who are in the building trades know the devastating effect that it has had on the construction industry, on the housing industry and the utility industry," he stressed.

In a collection on the convention floor, delegates raised $2,749 in volntary contributions for COPE operations.

A foreign policy resolution calling for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Southeast Asia and diversion of military spending for domestic needs was referred to the IBEW officers for further study.

The resolutions committee recommended that the officers review the resolution and "coordinate the official position of the IBEW with the AFL-CIO and . . . remain in the mainstream of the American labor movement" on foreign policy matters.

Delegates approved salary increases for officers, council members and senior representatives of the union.

The new salary schedule boosts the president's annual wage to $60,000 from $40,000; the secretary's wage goes to $55,000 from $38,000; treasurer, $15,000 from $11,000; vice presidents, $35,000 from $25,000; council chairman, $15,000 from $11,000; council members, $12,000 from $9,000, and senior representatives to $25,000 from $20,000.

But deducting the self-financing of the Nelson Rockefeller campaign, the Rockefeller family was outspent by the Mellon family. Five members of the Mellon family contributed a total of $249,462—all to Republican candidates. The five Rockefeller brothers donated $195,000 to Republican candidates and $5,000 to Democrats.

A Chicago insurance executive W. Clement Stone, described as a strong supporter of Richard Nixon's presidential campaign, donated $200,000 to Republican committees.

Executives of the nation's 25 largest industrial corporations also strongly favored Republican candidates in their political donations.

Republicans received $782,839 from 219 big company executives, compared with $132,150 from 26 contributors for the Democrats.

Companies with the largest political contributions from executives were Ford, with donations totaling $87,100 to Republicans and $53,000 to Democrats; International Business Machines, with $104,250 to Republicans and $32,000 to Democrats, and General Motors, with executive contributions of $114,675 to Republican candidates only $1,000 to Democrats.

Members of the prestigious Business Council gave $280,913 to Republican candidates in 1968 to $83,000 to Democrats — a turnabout from 1964 when, for the first time, Business Council members donated more money to Democratic committees than to the Goldwater-led Republicans.

About 70 percent of the persons listed by Fortune magazine as the "richest of the rich" contributed to the 1968 political campaigns. But the donors did not include the two men at the top of the list—billionaires J. Paul Getty and Howard Hughes.

Textile Garment Unions Map Hemisphere Goals

Mexico City—The Inter-American Federation of Textile & Garment Workers at its annual meeting here studied efforts needed to improve living standards and working conditions of workers in the Latin countries. The federation also called for a strengthening of the trade union movement in Central and South America as a move to bring about the goals.

Representing unions from North America were Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America and Vice Pres. Charles Zimmerman of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Meany Outlines Principles:

Full-Scale Bargaining System Urged for All Federal Workers

member council of unions, proportionally representative of blue-collar and white-collar employes and of unions holding exclusive recognition." Five negotiators from the Civil Service Commission would represent management. A neutral chairman, appointed by the President, would preside but would not have a vote.

- All issues unresolved after 90 days of bargaining could be referred to an impartial arbitration board on the motion of either party. The arbitration board would have one member from the union side, one from management, and a chairman named by the other two. If they could not agree, he would be designated by the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service but must come from outside the federal government.
- All wage issues would be negotiable, within the general framework of the comparability standards Congress has set for salaried employes and the area prevailing wage standards for employes paid under the wage board system.
- Shift premiums, hazard pay, hours, vacations and holidays would all be subject to bargaining. Also negotiatble would be existing job grading and classification systems, determination of wage board issues, establishment of wage rate schedules and working conditions generally.
- Grievance procedures would be established for resolving disputes over interpretation of the contract, with binding arbitration as a final step. Classification disputes, which are not now appealable as grievances, would be subject to the grievance procedure.
- The Civil Service Retirement Act and veterans preference law would remain in effect. All other laws dealing with wages or fringe benefits could be improved through the bargaining process.

Meany proposed that Congress authorize this bargaining procedure for a five-year period, and during the fifth year evaluate its operation and consider whether the legislation should be renewed.

He invited management of government agencies to join with the unions in working out the details of a collective bargaining proposal to present to Congress.

Meany reminded the government executives that the spontaneous strikes that erupted in the postal service last spring demonstrate that it is "not enough" to have a law prohibiting strikes.

"Despite the law," he stressed, "federal workers have gone on strike. They struck out of a sense of deep and continuing frustration. They struck when they felt that they had no other alternative if they were to achieve a redress of their legitimate grievances."

While the AFL-CIO does not "advocate illegal strikes," Meany said, "we recognize facts, and it is a fact that desperate workers will strike" if they have no other recourse.

Full collective bargaining rights, with unresolved disputes subject to arbitration outside of government control, "are absolutely essential to compensate for the denial by law to federal workers of the right to strike," Meany insisted.

The hearings were called by the Federal Labor Relations Council to evaluate the first year of experience under Pres. Nixon's Executive Order 11491, the successor to the original labor-management relations order issued by the late Pres. Kennedy and confirmed by Pres. Johnson.

Union witnesses told the council that it has taken so long to grind up the machinery of the executive order—a process that is still not complete—that only a partial appraisal could be given at this time.

John A. McCart, director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, said the delay in carrying out the new program itself "dramatizes the failure of the federal government to move expeditiously to meet the pressing needs of collective bargaining at a time when public service and federal labor relations are undergoing severe stress."

Maywood Boggs, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. stressed the continuing need for an independent agency, with full-time leadership and staff, to administer the labor-management relations program. It should include, he said, an office of general counsel comparable to that in the National Labor Relations Board to prosecute unfair labor practice charges in the public interest.

Government Employes Pres. John F. Griner and other union witnesses strongly protested the government's new policy of requiring local union negotiators to use their annual leave time or take leave without pay to carry on official union-management business during working hours—while the management representatives are paid for their participation in negotiations.

Griner also protested abolishment of "card-check" recognition of unions, even when there is no "good faith doubt" of a union's majority.

In other opening day testimony:

- W. H. Ryan, testifying for Machinists Pres. Floyd Smith, said current prohibitions on union shop agreements have "no place in a federal government labor-management relations program."

He said unions with exclusive bargaining rights "at the very least" should be permitted to negotiate agency shop agreements.

- Henry T. Wilson, counsel for the Laborers, said lengthy delays have marred the operations of the government's new program. And he objected that unions have not been represented on the various administrative bodies set up under the executive order.

Citing the limitations of executive orders, Wilson said "the example of free, open collective bargaining which will prevail in the postal service . . . will be a constant reminder to the remaining federal employes as to what is possible by legislation."

- Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes and a former assistant Secretary of Labor, said federal labor relations policy, as an experimental system, "must be open to change and continuing revision."

He suggested that "any review of a system that denies the right to strike must include review of that denial" to judge whether it is really necessary or desirable.

House Upholds Action Cutting Funds for ILO

A $3.7 million cut in funds for the International Labor Organization was confirmed by the House as it voted final approval of an appropriations bill carrying funds for the State Dept. and other government agencies.

The effect of the vote is to withhold payment of U.S. contributions to the ILO for the current six-month period—and to express sharp dissatisfaction by Congress with increased Communist-bloc influence in the 50-year-old tripartite world agency.

The United States, one of 120-member nations, finances 25 percent of the ILO budget.

Rep. John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.), who headed the House conferees on the bill, said testimony last summer by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and by the U.S. employer and government representatives to the ILO, revealed an "outrageous" situation in terms of Soviet distortion of the function of the ILO.

Several House members spoke in opposition to the fund cutoff, urging that the issue of U.S. participation in the ILO be faced directly, not through a "default" of dues. They cited a State Dept. letter opposing the appropriations cut and arguing that the ILO assessment was a "legal obligation" under international law.

The House approved the conference report by voice vote, however.

The fund cut had initially been voted by the Senate on a 49-28 vote. Supporters of the cutback said during the Senate debate that the action did not represent a withdrawal from the ILO but "a warning as to how this country feels."

Dissatisfaction with the deterioration of the ILO's role as a force for improving conditions of workers came to a head this summer with the appointment of a Soviet representative as an assistant director-general of ILO.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last August adopted a sharp resolution protesting the ILO's "head-in-the-sands approach to Communist violations of human rights."

Alaska Delegates Push Equal Job Opportunities

Ketchikan, Alaska—The Alaska State AFL-CIO at its biennial convention here called for the establishment of a workable program to extend equal employment opportunities for all workers.

It urged both state and federal governments to set up one agency that would work with the labor movement and other interested organizations in the area.

Pres. Dwayne Carlson of the state federation appointed a standing committee of union representatives that will concentrate efforts for development of the program.

Delegates voted to raise per capita payments from 25 cents to 30 cents. The additional 5 cents will be channelled into the Committee on Political Education fund.

The convention endorsed the election of a full slate of Democrats for top state offices. Winning the support of delegates were William A. Egan, who faces incumbent Republican Gov. Keith Miller Nov. 3, and Egan's running mate, H. A. Boucher, who is seeking the post of lieutenant governor.

In the race for the U.S. Senate, delegates backed Wendell P. Kay, who opposes incumbent Sen. Theodore F. Stevens. State Sen. Nick Begich was endorsed for election to Alaska's lone congressional seat, now held by Republican Howard W. Pollock. Pollock was defeated in the Republican primary for governor by Miller and will not be running for re-election to Congress.

DISASTER RELIEF operations aiding members of AFL-CIO unions in Corpus Christi, Tex., who were affected by Hurricane Celia are checked over by A. B. Smith, AFL-CIO Community Services liaison representative with the Red Cross, and John Jordan of the Postal Clerks. Donations from local labor councils and the Texas AFL-CIO are being used to help hurricane victims obtain government loans, temporary housing and legal counseling. Operations are centered in a Communications Workers' union hall.

New EEOC Powers Approved by Senate

The Senate voted 47-24 approval of a bill making major changes in the powers and structure of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and extending the federal ban on job discrimination to an additional 19 million workers.

The legislation includes some, but not all, of the reforms that have long been urged by the AFL-CIO and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

It strengthens the EEOC, giving it powers to act against job discrimination similar to the authority the National Labor Relations Board has to deal with unfair labor practices.

But it leaves virtually untouched the jumble of overlapping jurisdictions and multiplicity of federal agencies dealing with charges of job discrimination—and often coming to contradictory conclusions.

The original legislation sought by labor and civil rights groups would have both strengthened the EEOC and brought all programs aimed at preventing discrimination in employment under a single agency.

The Senate bill would model the EEOC after the NLRB, in structure as well as powers.

It would establish a new post of general counsel, appointed by the President subject to Senate confirmation, to serve in effect as the executive head of the agency. The commission would operate as a quasi-judicial body. It would have authority to issue "cease and desist" orders to remedy job discrimination based on race, sex, religion or national origin. These orders if not complied with, would be subject to enforcement and review in federal appellate courts, as is the case with NLRB orders.

A controversial point of difference from the NLRB procedures requires the EEOC to appoint a lawyer for the complaining party if he cannot afford one, even though the general counsel's office would prosecute the case once a complaint was issued.

If the charge of discrimination were upheld, the employer or union charged would end up paying the attorney's fee; if the employer or union should be exonerated, the EEOC would pay the complaining party's lawyer.

As at present, even if the EEOC found that a complaint were not valid, the charge could still be pressed through a Justice Dept. court suit alleging a "pattern" of discrimination, through the Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance which deals with charges of discrimination by government contractors, through the NLRB in certain cases involving a union's obligation to represent all the workers in a bargaining unit, as well as in a suit brought in federal court.

The Senate bill would allow the Justice Dept. to transfer its powers to file "pattern" suits against discrimination to the EEOC after three years—if both the Attorney General and a majority of the commission agreed to this.

On the plus side, the Senate bill extends coverage to an estimated 9.5 million state and local government employes who had been exempt from the original law. It also would add an equal number over a three-year period by lowering the cutoff for private industry coverage from the present 25 employes to establishments with eight or more employes.

An attempt by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr., (D-N.C.) to delete state and local government coverage was beaten, 37-30.

The Senate also rejected an Administration amendment, proposed by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.), which would have taken away most of the powers given to the EEOC and placed enforcement of the law in federal district courts. The vote was 42-27.

Another Dominick amendment carried, however, deleting from the bill a section transfering to the EEOC the Civil Service Commission's responsibilities to prevent discrimination in federal employment.

A similar, although not identical, bill has been approved by the House Labor Committee but has not yet been cleared for floor action by the Rules Committee.

Paladino Named To Head AAFLI

Morris Paladino has been appointed executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute to succeed Gerard P. O'Keefe, who has headed AAFLI since its inception in 1968.

O'Keefe has returned to the Retail Clerks where he has resumed his duties as director of international affairs.

Since 1967 Paladino has been assistant general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

tences for professional drug "pushers" while cutting penalties for drug users and establishing a national institute for the prevention and control of drug use and addiction. The House crime bill is aimed at cracking down on organized crime and also includes stiff new penalties for terrorists and death sentences for persons guilty of bombings that cost lives.

● A House-Senate conference committee reached agreement on legislation aimed at halting the use of secret Swiss bank accounts to hide income from illegal sources and to evade U.S. income taxes.

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), who handled the bill in the Senate, said the legislation was urgently needed because "it is unfair that millions of hard-working taxpayers should be forced to pay taxes while the white-collar criminal gets off scot free by hiding his income in a secret foreign bank account."

● Sponsors of the electoral reform constitutional amendment reluctantly conceded defeat in their efforts to get a Senate vote on the House-passed measure for direct election of the President.

The Senate then turned to the controversial "equal rights for women" amendment, supported by a number of women's organizations but strongly opposed by most unions and women trade union leaders as undermining labor-supported laws protecting women workers against exploitation.

As was the case with the electoral reform measure, the Senate was devoting only several hours a day to debate and then turning to other legislation. But a showdown vote was expected before the recess. The House has already passed the amendment.

● House-Senate conferees were expected to reach quick final agreement on a legislative reform bill, since by tradition neither body interferes with internal changes affecting the other house.

On the House side, the biggest reform is an end of secrecy in "teller votes" on amendments. The Senate voted to establish a new Veterans Affairs Committee, a body that the House has long had. The Senate's Labor & Public Welfare Committee presently has jurisdiction over legislation affecting veterans.

● Congress and the Administration remained at cross-purposes over spending for public works, including water and sewage construction to curb pollution. Pres. Nixon let a bill authorizing $1 billion in water and sewer grants become law without his signature and said it would be "irresponsible" if the money were later actually appropriated. The next day he complained about excessive money in a $5.2 billion appropriation bill. He signed the measure but said he would not release funds for a number of the projects.

● The House Commerce Committee approved a bill to salvage rail passenger transportation by creating a government-sponsored private corporation to take over all intercity passenger trains. The Senate has passed a similar bill.

sistant commissioner of the BLS, said other overriding economic factors could neutralize this situation.

The unemployment rate for men 25 and over was unchanged from the August level of 3 percent. The rate for married men also held at 2.9 percent in September.

For adult women, joblessness rose three-tenths of 1 percent over the month to 5.1 percent. The increase was mainly for women 25 and over, whose rate climbed to 4.4 percent from 4.1 percent in August. The jobless rate for women 20-24 was virtually unchanged at 8.4 percent.

The total unemployment figure includes 1,562,000 men 20 years and older; 1,598,000 women 20 and over, and 1,131,000 teenagers of both sexes.

Rates for both white and Negro workers were up in September, the BLS said. The white rate rose from 4.8 percent to 5.1 percent, the highest since July 1963. The Negro rate was at 9 percent, up from 8.4 percent in August and slightly more than the highs reached earlier this year.

Unemployment rates for both full-time and part-time job seekers also rose in September. The full-time rate was up to 5 percent after holding relatively steady at 4.7 percent for the previous four months. The part-time rate climbed from 8 percent to 8.6 percent, the highest since the series began in 1963.

Labor Dept. statisticians said that the number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer continued to climb in September to 790,000, double the level of September 1969 and the highest since mid-1965.

The jobless rate for blue-collar workers rose from 7 percent in August to 7.5 percent last month. This was due mainly to layoffs among craftsmen and nonfarm laborers, the BLS said.

Construction workers were hit harder by unemployment as their rate rose to 13.8 percent in September from 12.2 percent the month before.

Unemployment in manufacturing climbed from 5.7 percent to 6.1 percent last month. The auto strike did not affect the statistics, since strikers are not counted as being unemployed, the BLS pointed out.

The jobless rate for white-collar workers edged up one-tenth of 1 percent to 2.8 percent in September, but was below the nine-year high of 3.1 percent reached in July.

There were 82.5 million persons in the civilian labor forces in September, about 1.6 million less than in August. But this decline is less than usual for the season, the report noted, and may reflect the effects of the survey week occurring early in the month.

Government Employes Win Runoff Election

Philadelphia — The AFL-CIO-affiliated American Federation of Government Employes won a solid 717-543 victory in a runoff collective bargaining election at the Aviation Supply Office.

AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig said the runoff reversed the outcome of a vote last August in which the unaffiliated National Association of Government Employes led the balloting, but fell short of a majority of votes cast.

Joe Garvin of the AFL-CIO organizing staff assisted the AFGE representatives and Local 1698 in the election campaign.

Staff Interns Take Course at Studies Center

Ten AFL-CIO interns, recent colllege graduates and union staff members who currently serve in nine AFL-CIO headquarters departments, recently completed a two-week staff development program at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

Co-Chairmen of the program were center staff members Marge Rachlin and Bob Bell.

The aim of the program was to give the interns additional background on the labor movement and the issues and challenges confronting it. The program focused on four main subject areas:

● The general pattern of the economy, including environmental concerns, income distribution and poverty, taught by Charles Wilber, a faculty member at the center and chairman of the Economics Dept. at American University.

● The American system of unionism, led by Otto Pragan of the center's senior staff.

● Sociology of Unions, taught by manpower social scientist Harold Sheppard.

● A series led by AFL-CIO staff members on such labor issues as national health insurance, public and workers' education, and the 1970 congressional election.

The interns are Pamela Schnierle and Barrett Seeley, Dept. of Education; Bobbie Creque, Dept. of Community Services; Alvin Thomas, Civil Rights; Gregory Humphrey, Legislation; Jane Van Sant, Publications and Public Relations; James Lonergan, International Affairs; John Volpe, Research; Vaughn Ball, Social Security, and Catherine McCleave, COPE.

The interns are expected to be available for placement with federation affiliates and with the AFL-CIO state and central bodies following their one-year program.

ing subsidies, to make it possible for U.S. ships to compete on equal terms in the bulk cargo trade.

Paul Hall, president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and of the Seafarers, termed the new legislation "the greatest contribution to the maritime industry since the initial Merchant Marine Act was adopted 34 years ago."

He said the American merchant fleet "has been devastated by age and neglect" and the new program can restore vigor "to an industry that has been nearly knocked to its knees."

He pledged that maritime unions will "do their full share" in cooperation with management and government to encourage the great increase in cargo that will be needed to fill the holds of "a fleet of modern, efficient American-flag vessels."

The final version of the legislation, based on Administration proposals and carrying strong bipartisan support, breezed through the House and Senate with only a handful of "nay" votes.

There was no opposition in the House to a compromise retaining the principle of present law that all components of ships built with federal subsidies must be American-made.

The Administration had sought to repeal this "buy American" provision entirely, and the original House bill would have limited it to "major components" of the hull and superstructure.

But the House approved the wording of a House-Senate conference committee. This permits departure from the "buy American" requirement for lesser components only if the Secretary of Commerce finds that the delivery of the ship will be delayed because of inability of American suppliers to fill orders.

The only controversial aspect of the final bill turned out to be the dropping of a Senate amendment that would have enabled the wooden river boat, Delta Queen, to continue to operate in violation of national safety standards for passenger vessels.

House and Senate conferees pledged their support for future legislation to provide a federal subsidy of 50 percent of the cost of building a new vessel to carry passengers on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

President Urged to Sign Limits on TV Campaigns

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the political broadcasting bill "an important step toward restoring faith in the democratic process" and urged Pres. Nixon to sign it into law.

The legislation, which passed the House and Senate by big margins, would set a ceiling on the amount candidates could spend for television and radio time.

"Rising campaign costs are convincing the American people that only the rich can afford to run for public office," Meany wired the President. "Limits on radio-TV political broadcasts will help maintain our democratic system."

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the President had only one more day to decide whether to sign the bill, veto it, or let it become law without his signature. It would not affect spending for next month's elections.

Trade Law Aid Authorized for Glass Workers

About 300 glass workers who lost their jobs at a PPG Industries plant in Henryetta, Okla., have been certified eligible for adjustment assistance because of the adverse impact of foreign imports.

The affected employes include about 215 Glass & Ceramic Workers and 85 Window Glass Cutters.

Certification by the Labor Dept. makes the Henryetta workers who lost their jobs or became underemployed after last Nov. 15, eligible for assistance under provisions of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962.

They now can apply for cash readjustment allowances that currently go up to $85 a week and will be eligible for counseling, new job training and placement. The payments are normally limited to 52 weeks, but up to 26 additional weeks are allowed for workers to complete approved training courses.

Cites Political Bias In Veto, Stalling

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged the Nixon Administration, the Secretary of Labor and key Republicans in Congress with "playing irresponsibly shameful politics with the lives and health of American workers."

By blocking Senate action on the job safety and health bill, Meany said, the Administration and its spokesmen are playing the "game" of employer groups that don't want any legislation.

In a separate statement, Meany attacked Pres. Nixon's veto of a bill to put a "reasonable ceiling" on campaign spending for political television and radio broadcasts.

The veto was "deplorable," Meany said, obviously "politically motivated," and should be overridden.

These were the developments that touched off the double-barreled AFL-CIO protests:

Election Costs

Republicans who joined with Democrats in supporting a ceiling on campaign spending for television and radio political broadcasts will have the decisive votes when Congress seeks to override Pres. Nixon's veto of the bill.

If they stick with their convictions, the Senate and House will muster the two-thirds majority needed to repass the legislation over the veto.

If they switch, as GOP leaders have urged, the sky will still be the limit and the candidate or party with the most money will be able to dominate the airwaves.

Meany had appealed in vain to the President to let the bill become law to "help maintain our democratic system." He stressed that "rising campaign costs are convincing the American people that only the rich can afford to run for public office."

Republican Party officials, their

Job Safety

Republicans put on a small-scale filibuster to keep the Senate from voting on a labor-supported occupational safety and health bill.

Their delaying tactics kept the legislation from the Senate floor at least until the post-election session of Congress.

The motive for "these tactics of delay and confusion is clear," Meany said.

"The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the business community want to block any occupational safety and health bill, and the Secretary of Labor, aided by certain key Republicans in Congress, is playing their game.

"Every day of delay adds to the appalling industrial casualty list," Meany warned. But the Secretary of Labor, he charged, "has heeded only the blind opposition of industry to this bill."

At the same time, he noted, the Administration has "unfairly at-

Consumer Bills Approved, Congress Turns to Campaign

Two consumer protection bills, legislation cracking down on tax evaders hiding money in secret Swiss bank accounts, and a bill to preserve passenger train service were among the labor-supported measures sent to the White House before Congress recessed until Nov. 16.

But a host of other major bills were put off until the post-election session, including some that had been scheduled for action before adjournment.

With election campaign absenteeism high, a small group of House obstructionists prevented action on a bipartisan manpower bill that includes an urgently-needed public service jobs program.

The legislation had been scheduled for a House vote on the final day of the session. It was supported by Democrats and Republicans, the Administration, the AFL-CIO and leading business groups. Its passage by a big margin appeared assured.

But a handful of conservatives forced the House into five successive, lengthy rollcalls to establish a quorum.

Just before the rule permitting consideration of the bill was to be called up for a vote, Rep. John A. Ashbrook (R-Ohio) demanded a quorum call.

Eventually, 298 congressmen answered to their names—about 80 more than the required number.

Minutes later, as congressmen drifted back to offices and committee rooms, Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) demanded a quorum call. This time, 279 replied.

The Speaker of the House had barely said, "The clerk will read the resolution," when Rep. Joe D. Waggoner, Jr. (D-La.), insisted on a quorum call. Another lengthy delay as 275 members responded.

By the time 277 members had answered present to the next quorum call demanded by Rep. John G. Schmitz (R-Calif.)—a John Birch Society member recently elected to fill a vacancy— it was obviously too late to take up the bill.

Rep. Ray J. Madden, (D-Ind.), who had moved adoption of the rule, withdrew his resolution in the face of what he termed "an organized filibuster of quorum calls made by opponents of this much-needed legislation."

And Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.), who had helped put together the bill in a bipartisan drafting session that continued until the early hours of the morning, spoke of his disappointment "that the House was prevented from considering this bill due to the obstructionist tactics of a few members."

So it was added to the already heavy agenda Congress will face on its return.

The two consumer bills won final approval through a legislative shortcut. The Senate added them to the tax evasion bill passed by the

Glass Bottle Union Wins Pace-Setting Contracts

Toledo—The Glass Bottle Blowers have negotiated new three-year contracts with Owens-Illinois, Inc., for a wage-and-benefits package averaging $1.60 an hour for about 16,000 workers.

The agreements are the first in this year's round of bargaining in the glass container industry and could set the pace as the GBBA prepares for negotiations with other producers.

Effective upon ratification are wage increases ranging from 25 to 58 cents an hour. Two additional hourly raises of 21 cents each will become effective Feb. 1, 1972, and Feb. 1, 1973.

Employes also will receive an estimated 7 cents an hour more as the company picks up the cost of certain fringe benefits.

The new contracts, which also include improvements in insurance, pension, holiday and vacation benefits, cover workers in 18 plants that account for about 30 percent of the glass container industry.

Although the old contracts were not due to expire until next year, Pres. Lee W. Minton of the GBBA called for early negotiations because of the inflationary factors

Senate Unit Approves Revised Trade Measure

The Senate Finance Committee voted tentative approval of a foreign trade bill that the Administration considers worse and the AFL-CIO regards as better than the legislation awaiting action in the House.

Neither the AFL-CIO nor the Administration was happy about the House bill, but for somewhat different reasons.

The Administration opposed provisions aimed at curbing imports of various products through a quota system designed to prevent further losses of American jobs.

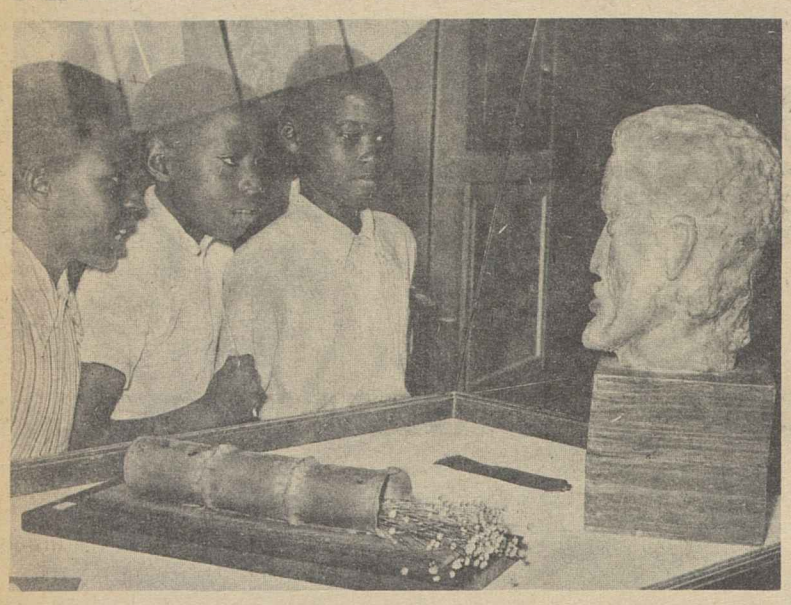
The federation wanted a broader, stop-gap quota mechanism that would stem a torrent of imports adversely affecting U.S. production and employment. And the AFL-CIO also wanted more sophisticated measures to deal with the intricate manipulations of multinational companies and foreign subsidiaries of U.S. corporations.



Labor's sharpest fire, however, was aimed at an Administration proposal to set up new tax loopholes for big corporations under the guise of encouraging U.S. exports.

Corporations would be able to defer taxes on export sales through a proposed Domestic International Sales Corporation, usually referred to by its initials as "DISC."

In testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, the AFL-CIO termed the DISC proposal the "most negative and harmful feature" of the bill that has been approved by coffers bulging and with the memory of a 1968 campaign in which the GOP was able to outspend the Democrats more than two-to-one for TV and radio time, urged the veto.

Nixon listened to them and sent the bill back to Congress with a complaint that it merely "plugs one hole in a sieve," that it would "discriminate" against the broadcasting industry, that it would be hard to enforce, and would give an advantage to better-known incumbents and disadvantage "any little known but highly qualified citizen" seeking public office.

White House officials told newsmen, however, that the Administration did not have any better proposals to submit to Congress to accomplish what Nixon described as "the highly laudable and widely supported goals of controlling political campaign expenditures."

The vetoed bill would have limited campaign broadcasting expenditures by candidates for President, Vice President, senator, congressman, governor and lieutenant governor. They could not spend for radio and television time more than seven cents for each vote cast for the office in the last previous election—or half that amount for primaries.

The bill would also require TV and radio stations to sell time to candidates at the lowest rate charged to commercial broadcasters.

In addition, the rigid "equal time" requirement that makes it difficult for stations to give time for political debates between major candidates would be repealed. Nixon's veto message did not make mention of that section of the bill.

Last August, when Congress was considering the legislation, the AFL-CIO said TV and radio stations should be required to provide a specified amount of free time for presidential and congressional campaigns in the public interest. But it said the proposed restrictions on political broadcast spending in the legislation was "an acceptable alternative approach."

Not until each house of Congress had initially passed the legislation by big margins was there even a hint of a presidential veto. Even then, the final version was approved by the House, 247-112, with most Republicans voting for the bill. And the final Senate vote was 60-19, with 17 Republicans in favor, 18 opposed.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has accepted membership on the Diamond Jubilee Committee of the Volunteers of America, a religious social welfare organization.

Fire Fighters Seek Right to Early Pension

Union spokesmen urged Congress to approve legislation giving early retirement rights to fire fighters employed by the federal government.

Fire fighters want to be included in the government's list of hazardous duty occupations, which carry the right to retirement at age 50 after 20 years of service. For most federal workers, the requirement is 30 years of service at age 55.

Jack Waller, legislative representative of the Fire Fighters, and Al Davis, the union's federal employe representative, testified for the early retirement bill before a House Civil Service subcommittee.

They cited government data showing fire fighting to be the nation's second most hazardous occupation—trailing only mining. And they said fire fighters at federal installations are exposed to additional health hazards by being required to handle deadly chemicals and radioactive materials.

In Compensation Cases:

Issue of Legal Aid Before High Court

The Supreme Court agreed to review a plea by the United Transportation Union that it has the right to give legal counsel to its members in on-the-job injury cases despite a contrary ruling by the Michigan state court.

The case dates back to 1959 when the Michigan Bar Association filed suit against the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen—one of the four unions that now make up the UTU—charging that the operations of the union's legal aid department violated Michigan law.

The Michigan bar group contended that the union solicited cases and claims on deaths and injuries and then pursued them through its regional legal counsel in Chicago.

Michigan's Jackson County Circuit Court decided that the bar association was entitled to an injunction. But in 1964, the Michigan Supreme Court delayed a ruling on the suit until the U.S. Supreme Court completed a review of a similar case brought by the Virginia Bar Association.

After the high court vacated the Virginia decree and remanded the case for further hearings, the Michigan Supreme Court sent the UTU case back to Jackson County.

In 1968, the Jackson court ordered a permanent injunction barring the UTU from providing legal advice to its members and their families. The Michigan Supreme Court affirmed the decision and the union appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The UTU argues that the state court's injunction violates the rights of its members under the 1st and 14th Amendments to the Constitution. It maintains that the union gives its members the opportunity "to accept or reject union counsel to represent them in personal injury or death claims under the Federal Employers' Liability Act."

The union argues further that the granting of the state court injunction runs counter to two earlier decisions of the Supreme Court on similar cases.

Another case which the Supreme Court agreed to review involves a dispute over the duties of the National Labor Relations Board in union representation elections.

At issue is whether the NLRB must review the decisions of its regional directors in determining the scope of bargaining units before it orders an employer to bargain.

The case stems from a dispute at Magnesium Casting Co.'s plant in Hyde Park, Mass., where the Steelworkers won an NLRB representation election in 1968.

The company refused to bargain on the ground that certain employes did not qualify as members of the bargaining unit, and it challenged the NLRB's order to bargain.

The First Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the NLRB, ruling that the labor board is not required to make its own findings of fact before it can conclude that a company violated the Taft Act by refusing to bargain.

The Supreme Court also agreed to decide whether federal courts may bar a strike by railroad unions on the contention they did not live up to their contract, if the National Mediation Board has not yet considered the issue. The case involves the UTU and the Chicago & North Western Railway.

Pilots Back Bill To Bar Airline Strike Compact

The Air Line Pilots Association has endorsed a bill introduced by Rep. Donald Fraser (D-Minn.) to terminate the airlines' "mutual aid pact" under which an airline closed down by a strike receives payments from other airlines.

ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby charged that the pact is "encouraging airlines to delay settlement of their labor disputes." He cited the four-month-old strike of the clerks on Northwest Orient Airlines as an example.

Ruby said Northwest received $10 million in mutual aid through August and, as a result, expects its profits to be normal. Yet, he noted, Northwest refused for a considerable time to attend bargaining sessions.

The mutual aid pact has been expanded during the past year, Ruby noted. All trunk airlines except Delta and Northeast are now members, and payments to a struck airline have been increased from a maximum of 25 percent to 50 percent of normal operating expenses for shut-down flight operations for the first 14 days of a strike.

"With no payroll to meet and operating expenses reduced, the airline has less incentive to end the strike," Ruby noted.

ALPA has a suit pending in the U.S. Court of Appeals against the Civil Aeronautics Board's decision to approve the mutual aid pact. The union is also seeking an injunction and $10 million in lost pay and damages from Northwest in another case.

Additional information released by the Pilots in support of the bill indicated that National Airlines received $25 million in "mutual aid" during its four-month strike earlier this year, resulting in a profit of $8 million for the fiscal year.

Kirkland Spurs Campaign Effort:

Administration Policies Scored As 'Program' for Job Slump

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged the Nixon Administration with "conscious planning and deliberate programming" of economic policies that have resulted in the rise in the unemployment rate to 5.5 percent, deepening industrial stagnation, soaring prices and high interest rates.

He issued the indictment at the 25th convention of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers and called on the delegates for a massive effort in the final days of the campaign to elect labor's friends to Congress.

Only a progressive Congress, Kirkland said, can overcome the Administration's failures and enact legislation to revive the economy and meet the needs of the people for jobs, housing, educational facilities and health care.

The convention responded to the call for action, stressed also in speeches and reports by the union's officers, with a political action resolution pledging a "maximum" effort in the elections.

Pres. Andrew J. Pettis, re-elected to a new four-year term, said a strong U.S. merchant marine can be a major factor in restoring the sagging economy.

The union, he said, will press for full funding of the new merchant fleet building program and further steps to reverse the "devastating decline" of the American-flag merchant fleet.

He renewed the union's call for an independent maritime agency and its opposition to use of foreign-flag vessels owned by runaway U.S. operators and corporations to carry preference and military cargo.

The convention unanimously elected 29-year-old Eugene McCabe of Quincy, Mass., as the new vice president, succeeding John F. Bonner. To succeed the union's veteran secretary-treasurer, Ross D. Blood, delegates picked J. Pat Daniels of Wilmington, Calif. Blood is retiring after 26 years in office.

In major resolutions, the conventoin called for a national health insurance program, strong health and safety protections, improved workmen's compensation and new consumer protection laws.

Delegates reaffirmed their battle to eradicate discrimination against Negroes and other minority groups, called for full funding of education programs, endorsed social security improvements and backed a program to prevent further pollution of the environment.

Thy called for tax justice and reasserted the need for federal minimum standards of unemployment insurance.

The convention said an increase in the minimum wage to $2.50 an hour is clearly warranted, and urged that all workers be covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Another resolution assailed extremists of both the right and left as a continuing threat to American democracy.

Delegates reaffirmed their support of the work and goals of the International Metalworkers Federation and called for an end to duty-free foreign trade zones.

They urged as a key to effective welfare reform national standards assuring decent jobs at decent wages.

Convention speakers and committee reports called for allocation of naval repair and conversion work to the "withering" shipyards of the nation.

They backed programs for development and building of nuclear-powered ships and revitalization of the U.S. passenger fleet.

On trade union issues, convention discussions centered on stepped-up organizing to continue the union's growth and the need to combat laws and employers seeking to thwart organizing and collective bargaining.

And during the five-day convention, delegates backed up expressions of support with cash donations to the striking Herald-Examiner workers in Los Angeles and to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. They pledged continued support for these strikes.

Kirkland, in his speech to the convention, recalled the unkept promises that Pres. Nixon has made—that inflation would be halted and that workers' jobs would not be sacrificed.

He said the President ignored the "warning voices" telling him that his economic policies were headed in the wrong direction.

Instead, Nixon "clung blindly to his tight money policy," and said the harmful effect predicted "wouldn't happen."

But, Kirkland stressed, "it did happen, and it is continuing to happen."

Full Slate of Liberals Backed in Wisconsin

La Crosse, Wis.—Delegates to the Wisconsin AFL-CIO's sixth biennial convention endorsed a slate of liberal candidates for the Nov. 3 elections after hearing speakers assail the record of the Nixon Administration.

They also elected a new secretary-treasurer to succeed George W. Hall, 66, who retired after 43 years in the labor movement.

The approximately 600 delegates roared their approval of Sen. William Proxmire, who is seeking re-election, and Patrick J. Lucey, former lieutenant governor who is running for governor. Both are Democrats.

Proxmire is opposed by Republican John Erickson and Lucey by Republican Lt. Gov. Jack Olson.

Also endorsed at the convention were Thomas Jacobson (D) for attorney-general, five incumbent congressmen and four other congressional candidates. The incumbents are Robert Kastenmeier, Clement Zablocki, David Obey, all Democrats, and Republican Alvin O'Konski.

The delegates supported the Rev. Ray Short (D) against Rep. Vernon W. Thompson (R), Milwaukee County Supervisor Fred Tabak (D) in his effort to unseat Rep. Glenn Davis (R), the Rev. Robert J. Cornell against Rep. John W. Byrnes (R) and Leslie Aspin (D), who opposes Rep. Henry C. Schadeberg (R).

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in a convention speech that there was not a better senator anywhere than Proxmire, nor a worse congressman than Davis.

Biemiller, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and State AFL-CIO Pres. John W. Schmitt told the local union leaders that the Nixon Administration is using "law and order" as a smokescreen to hide the failures of its economic policies.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman criticized the Administration for opposing national health insurance but predicted that such a medical care system would be enacted because "its time has come."

Hall was succeeded by Jack Reihl, 40, a member of the Carpenters and a state AFL-CIO staff representative for the last year. A La Crossse native, Reihl served six years as an alderman here and was active in the Government Employes while working for the Commerce Dept. in Duluth, Minn.

Hall had been secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO since it was formed by merger in 1958. From 1951 to 1958, he was secretary-treasurer of the state AFL. Before that he headed the La Crosse Trades and Labor Council for about 15 years.

Schmitt and Vice Pres. John Giacomo were re-elected. The delegates also approved a $3,000 salary raise now and $2,000 more next October for the three officers.

The second raise will bring the president's salary to $22,000 and the other officers' to $20,000.

Rustin Dinner Set To Aid Institute

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph are two of the four chairmen of a committee formed to honor civil rights leader Bayard Rustin at a testimonial dinner, Dec. 14, marking Rustin's 60th birthday.

The committee is sponsored by a broad coalition of national leaders, including at least 39 international union presidents. The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University, and Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, also are serving as chairmen.

The committee hopes to raise $200,000 for the A. Philip Randolph Institute, which Rustin directs. The institute was founded in 1964 to mobilize the nation's resources—white and black—in an effort to bring equality and justice to all citizens. The institute works with civil rights groups, organized labor, religious denominations, students and liberals.

Nationwide Competition Tests Young Carpenters

Denver, Colo.—The 1970 Carpenters' Apprenticeship Contest drew a record number of contestants and several thousand spectators to the Cinderella Shopping Center in nearby Englewood. The 69 top carpenter, mill-cabinet and millwright apprentices in the United States and Canada competed there for almost $12,000 in prize money, trophies and international prestige for their local unions.

The competition was so sharp, the judges reported that in some instances winning scores were determined by the third decimal point. Each contestant took a four-hour written test and, on the alternate day, produced in eight hours a carefully selected "manipulative" project.

Thirty-six carpenter apprentices, 15 mill-cabinet apprentices and 18 millwrights came from as far away as Honolulu and Massachusetts to compete. First place winners were Roger Irving Shepard of Schenectady, N.Y., in the carpentry category; Scott W. Robinson of San Rafael, Calif., in the mill-cabinet division, and William Stewart of East Detroit, Mich., in the millwright competition.

In a message read at the awards banquet, Carpenters' Pres. M. A. Hutcheson praised the young men "who understand that achievement comes from hard work and steady application."

Hutcheson warned that there are dangers surrounding the whole field of apprenticeship training.

"There are contractor organizations," he said, "which want to fragment the trade by turning out 60-day wonders who can do one thing only. There are militant minority group leaders who want to make color rather than skill the basis for hiring. There are forces within the government which see something other than traditional apprenticeship as the wave of the future."

The annual apprenticeship contest is sponsored by the union, the Associated General Contractors of America, Inc. and the National Association of Home Builders.

Transport Service Sets New Organizing Goals

Chicago—The Transport Service Employes' convention instituted programs to expand the union's organizing efforts and improve the collective bargaining process for members. Delegates to the 17th biennial assembly also approved an increase in per capita payments to cover mounting operating costs.

The 50 convention delegates called for total involvement by union officers, representatives and members in the organizing program aimed at winning contracts for under-paid and exploited workers while enlarging the UTSE membership rolls.

Because of plant closings, cutbacks in railroad passenger service, and other economic factors, the union has sustained an overall loss in membership despite some offsetting gains through organizing, the convention was told. The resulting impact on the UTSE treasury has been severe, the top officers reported.

Delegates voted to increase the maximum dues of members from $5 to $7.50 a month and raised the per capita tax from $3.50 to $6.

Pres. George P. Sabattie told the convention that additional income from the increase would be needed to cover mounting operating costs.

The delegates also called for the UTSE to establish a collective bargaining training program to instruct local union committees on contract negotiations and grievance procedures.

In his address to the convention, Sabattie cited the need for a national solution to problems of the cities, particularly those involving slums, disease, poverty and crime.

"These are problems the Administration and other elected officials must address themselves to in order to correct economic and social injustices," Sabattie suggested.

"With the November congressional elections approaching," he continued, "organized labor, working classes, minority groups must put forth their efforts to elect candidates . . . who will devote themselves to the needs and problems of our nation, its states and cities."

He urged members to cooperate with the AFL-CIO and its Committee on Political Education in the election campaigns. The convention adopted a political action resolution instructing local COPE committees to work with progressive groups in their communities.

In another action, the delegates called on Congress to establish a national minimum wage of $2.50 an hour to keep pace with increasing prices and to extend coverage to all workers.

Sabattie reported that the UTSE is continuing merger negotiations initiated last year with the Sleeping Car Porters. Merger committees have been established by both unions and financial reports and other relevant materials were exchanged at the most recent meeting, Sabattie said.

ILG's Rolnick Remamed To HEW Advisory Unit

Louis Rolnick, national director of welfare and health benefits for the Ladies' Garment Workers, has been reappointed to the Medical Assistance Advisory Council of the Dept of Health, Education & Welfare. The 21-member council advises the HEW on the administration of the multi-million dollar Medicaid program.

Profits and Schools

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION is quietly but intensively looking for new ways of directing the nation's schools away from traditional public service, non-profit institutions into profitable ventures for private enterprise.

The Administration's approach has taken several forms:

● Through the Office for Economic Opportunity it has awarded a total of $5.6 million in "performance contracts" to six firms. The contracts will involve 27,000 students in grades 1-3 and 7-9 at 18 different sites across the country.

A "performance contract" is a device under which private companies are paid to take over teaching in schools and are paid on the basis of how well they improve a pupil's performance as measured by standardized tests.

● The Rand Corp. has begun work on a $300,000 16-month evaluation of performance contracting under a research grant from the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare. An economist who will direct the evaluation says one of the goals will be to draw lessons for education from the experience of military services and other users of incentive contracts.

● The Administration continues to push for expansion of the voucher plan under which parents would receive education vouchers for their children's education, could enroll them in any school of their choice and use the vouchers to pay the tuition.

Typical of the support the plan produces is this comment included in a statement submitted to a House Education subcommittee: "Introducing a voucher system would open up a large new industry which might provide special business opportunities to indigenous ghetto businessmen. . . ."

● The nomination by the President of Dr. Sidney P. Marland, Jr., to be U.S. Commissioner of Education has drawn opposition, specifically from the AFL-CIO, on a number of grounds, one of them his ties with the education industry and its profit approach.

Dr. Marland has been president of the Institute for Education Development since 1967. The IED has as its declared purpose "closing the circle between education, industry and government."

There is other evidence slowly accumulating that the Administration is seeking to move in the direction of turning an increasing share of the nation's responsibility for educating its children over to private enterprise operating on an education-for-profit basis.

It was this that led the AFL-CIO Executive Council back in August to warn of the new encroachments. It said:

"Organized labor has championed the public schools since their inception. It is a sorry commentary upon the Nixon Administration's educational policies that it is necessary for us at this late date in history to reiterate our belief that for all children, rich or poor, black or white, the best hope for American education lies in strengthening the public schools throughout the nation."

Elitist Road to Righteousness Leads Directly to Police State

By John P. Roche

TO BE AN idealist and simultaneously a committed supporter of the democratic process is often depressing. Obviously if you strongly believe something is right, you want to see it implemented in public policy. When you think something is dead wrong—a war, police brutality, racial discrimination—you want it stopped, right now. To be told that five out of six Americans think that, say, the Chicago police in 1968 did just right does not generate respect for the democratic system. On the contrary, it launches—particularly among the young—a desperate quest for a shortcut to righteousness.

There is, however, one overwhelming and appalling historical fact about shortcuts to righteousness: they inevitably lead to police states. The original idealists become secret policemen, or are replaced by gangster ideologues delighted to have a cosmic license for brutality.

A militant idealist is, of course, always on something of an ego-trip. Given power, he seldom takes long to convince himself that compulsion is a legitimate technique of political education, that his task, in the phrase of Jean Jacques Rousseau, is to "force people to be free," that is, to compel them to accept his views.

A principled democrat, then, must repudiate these elitist shortcuts, but such repudiation should not drive him to the opposite view, that the voice of the people is the voice of God. He should accept majority rule as the least-worst system ever invented by the wit of man (to paraphrase Churchill), but feel no compulsion to accept something as true because it has mobilized the support of 51 percent of the population. His commitment, in short, is not to the positions adopted by the majority, but to majority rule as a technique of making decisions, one hopes, from his vantage point, right ones. He works, as they say, "within the system."

I have gone into this at some length because it is relevant to the argument currently raging over Richard Scammon and Ben Wattenberg's book, "The Real Majority." Those who demand "a reordering of national priorities" have accused Scammon & Wattenberg of being third-rate Machiavellis, and claim that the moral of "The Real Majority" is to find out where the masses are going and lead them. The authors are accused of cheap cynicism, of providing Spiro Agnew with his strategic guidance, and generally of disillusioning the young.

Now part of the problem here is rhetorical. The line between describing something and advocating it can often get quite blurred, and at several points in their book Scammon & Wattenberg go beyond their brief—particularly when they suggest model speeches for Democratic and Republican candidates. This jarred me when I read it. It was cute, but it needlessly opened a line of critical assault.

HOWEVER, THE GUTS of the book is a remarkable profile of American politics in the 1970s, an essential prerequisite for anyone who wants to change the system. For, as I have been telling everybody in range for 20 years, you have to earn the right to be a critic, the right to be taken seriously when you set out after the Establishment. You have to know your customers, which—to repeat—does not mean you necessarily accept their views. Above all, you should have the courage of your consequences.

As a case in point, take the campaign by the kamikaze liberals to bring down pro-Viet Nam liberal Democratic senators. How would the defeat of these men (e.g., Gale W. McGee, Henry M. Jackson, John O. Pastore) and of Hubert Humphrey alter the "system?"

Assuming the race for control of the Senate is as close as polls indicate, Republican victories in a few states would install the following key committee chairmen: Agriculture, Jack Miller (Iowa); Appropriations, Milton Young (N.D.); Armed Services, Margaret Chase Smith (Maine); Banking & Currency, Wallace Bennet (Utah) or John Tower (Texas); Finance, Bennett or Carl Curtis (Neb.); Judiciary, Roman Hruska (Neb.). The liberals would retain their playground, Foreign Relations (George Aiken, Vt.).

All right. If that is what you want, my militant friends, go to it. Just don't come around complaining about what that murderers' row will do to our "national priorities." You can't have it both ways.

Happy Jobless Give Up Eating, Do Their Thing to End Inflation

By Russell Baker

GREAT locker room interviews:

"Hello there, national-economy buffs. As we have all just heard, inflation has taken another terrific beating. The score has just been posted by the Labor Dept. and here it is, and get this now! Unemployed: 4,300,000. And that, believe it or not, is a full 5.5 percent of the nation's labor force out of work in September, as compared to 5.1 percent in August.

"What does it all mean? Well, national-economy fans, it's pretty good evidence that the old economy, after far too many months of being overheated, is really beginning to cool off. And if the cooling continues, of course, we may begin to see an end to the inflation. How about that, ladies and gentlemen!

"The unemployed are beginning to file into the locker room now and we will get one of their outstanding performers to our microphone in just a minute. They're a tired-looking bunch, ladies and gentlemen, but through the fatigue lines etched into their faces the unmistakable gleam of pride shines forth. Say there, fella, how about saying a word to our electronic audience?"

"Glad to. Hello, Ma. Hello, kids."

"You're going to have great news for those kids when you get home tonight, aren't you?"

"You can say that again, Bill. After a full day of looking for work, I'm still unemployed."

"Wonderful, fella. Just wonderful. I'm sure those kids are going to be just as proud of you as we are here in electronic audienceland. This means, of course, that you won't be bringing home any income for at least the next week."

"That's right, Bill. And by not bringing home any money, I won't be generating any of those ugly inflationary pressures on the national economy. It really ought to help cool off the whole economy.

"It has to, fella. It just has to. And that means, for the folks out in electronic audienceland, some well deserved price stability, after years of seeing your dollars decline in value. Congratulations, fella. Keep up the good idleness. And now here is Clint Carker, folks. Clint, our cameras caught you losing your job in that brilliant workforce slash executed by Consolidated Cosmic this morning. Were you very surprised?"

"Yes, Bill, it was quite a little surprise, as I could see by the expression on my face when they ran the film on the instant replay, which I caught in the saloon across the street from the plant."

"I don't suppose a man kissing his wife goodbye in the morning as he leaves the house expects to be watching himself two hours later being fired on the instant replay, Clint."

"I'd say not, Bill."

"Did you and Mrs. Carker ever talk about the possibility of your becoming one of the unemployed?"

"Well, I guess everybody dreams about it, Bill. You know, you think, 'Gosh, wouldn't it be swell if I could get thrown out of work so I could help cool off our national economy and make a real contribution to stopping inflation!' I never thought it would happen though."

"Now that it has, Clint, we know Mrs. Carker is dying to hear the good news from your own lips, so we won't detain you. I see Soames Hindsight over their folks. Oh, Soames! Soames! Do you have a minute for our microphones?"

"A minute? I seem to have an eternity."

"How long, Soames, have you been unemployed?"

"Let's see. My unemployment, if you count my seasonally adjusted unemployment, amounts to ——. Well, I don't want to seem immodest, but ——."

"There is no need for false modesty on your part, Soames. All electronic audienceland knows what you have done to cool the economy and restrain inflation by failing to find work for month after month, year after year."

"Shucks, Bill. I'm nobody special. I just saw no jobs to be done, so I didn't do them."

"Yes, but you aren't one of those bums and loafers who aren't interested in work, Soames."

"I should hope not, Bill. The way I see it, anybody can be unemployed if he chooses to be a bum and loafer who isn't interested in work. But I don't think that's the decent way to stay unemployed. I like to spend every day looking for work. Then when I can't find it I go back to the Salvation Army every night feeling tired but good. That's because I feel I've really worked at being unemployed."

"Wonderful, Soames, and I'm sure all the folks out in electronic audienceland, who owe you so much for your great efforts against inflation, join with me in wishing you all the worst. Take it easy, boy. Maybe they'll put a piece of mutton in your soup tonight."

Low-Paid Workers Affected:

$100 Million in Wages Lost To Chiseling by Employers

HALF-A-MILLION of the nation's lowest-paid workers were chiseled out of $100 million due them last year under the federal wage and hour law, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald charged in a network radio interview.

A critical shortage of inspectors and reluctance of workers, fearing reprisals, to complain about underpayments hamper effective enforcement of the federal law that puts a floor under wages and a ceiling on hours of some 46 million workers, said Oswald, a staff member of federation's Dept. of Research. The federal government has "fewer than 1,000" wage and hour investigators, and it would take them "20 or 30 years" to investigate the more than 2 million firms covered by the law, he declared.

Yet, "under the cry of austerity, the Administration has failed to allocate and request additional funds to hire [more] investigators" to police compliance among employers, Oswald asserted. He was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Oswald said that the illegal underpayments affect nearly half-a-million workers each year, many of whom are "the most exploited" in the workforce. "Often they are not aware of their rights—they are taken advantage of by employers, sometimes unwittingly, sometimes with knowledge aforethought," he noted.

Many workers are "afraid to complain" about wage and hour violations, he said, "because they are not aware of the safeguards that are built into the act" to protect them. He stressed that under the procedures of the Labor Dept., the "origin of the complaint" and the names of the employes are "held in confidence" to protect the workers from reprisals from their employers.

Oswald also noted that while 38 states have their own minimum wage laws, in many cases they are even more poorly enforced than the federal law. "A few states do make a real effort toward enforcement," he said, "but even here, many workers are not aware of their rights under the state laws."

Oswald stressed the immediate need of underpaid workers for a federal minimum wage of $2 an hour and universal coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Reporters questioning Oswald on Labor News Conference were Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AS THE UNITED STATES rapidly draws close to Election Day there is clear evidence that unemployment figures will play a highly important role in the results.

There are some 4.3 million workers who are out of jobs, representing perhaps as many as 10 million wives and children whose bread and butter depends on whether or not the breadwinners in their families can find employment.

The government's September report represents the story as voters presumably will have it when they go into the voting booths. The figures will show an unemployment rate of 5.5 percent, the highest in the past six years and far above the 3.3 percent rate that Pres. Nixon inherited from the Democrats when he began a slow-down of the economy as his chief weapon against inflation.

There was no doubt that the September report came as a blow to the Administration. Within a matter of minutes, Chairman Paul W. McCracken of the President's Council of Economic Advisers was holding a press conference at the White House to explain that things weren't really as bad as they looked. After going through a variety of explanations of how the economy was going up but wasn't going up as yet to its full capacity, he asked the hypothetical question:

"Does the entire panoply of data which we are looking at here today indicate some kind of unexpected and disappointing shift in the course of the economy?"

"I think it is reasonable to interpret these data as answering that question in the negative," he replied to his own question.

Washington reporters asked McCracken whether someone in the White House had asked him to "conduct this briefing." No, he replied, it was his own idea.

HAROLD GOLDSTEIN, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, who did the briefing on the statistics themselves at the Labor Dept., was no less aware of the political significance of the September unemployment figures and went through considerable explanations to maintain his position as an objective economist.

Goldstein pointed to a number of factors to take the sting out of the bad news. The count had been made over the Labor Day holiday when a great number of students were going back to school but still were counted among the unemployed because, theoretically, they were still looking for work; some of the increases were not "statistically significant;" unemployment "appeared to have gone up in September" but the 5.5 percent rate represented "some exaggeration of the increase," and that it "was hard to say" how much increase there really had been.

All in all, it has become clear that everyone is watching the unemployment figures with eager eyes—with the Republicans determined to brush off the September increase as inconsequential.

What is important are the facts of unemployment as they have been clearly developing over the past year and a half.

There can be no hair-splitting here.

The number of jobless has climbed by about 1.9 million since the Nixon Administration came to power—from 2.4 million to 4.3 million.

The rate of unemployment has climbed from 3.3 percent to 5.5 percent.

The number of major job centers in the country suffering "substantial" unemployment (6 percent or more) has climbed from 6 to 35.

Key Races Facing Mid-Atlantic Voters

GOP Hopes to Add House Seats In Populous Five-State Region

By David L. Perlman

The five mid-Atlantic states are a ticket-splitting, two-party battleground with a clear preference for liberal Democrats and moderate Republicans.

Within the area—New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Delaware—are more than 41 million people, one out of every five Americans.

The region gave most of its electoral votes to Hubert Humphrey in 1968.

Most of its governors and senators are Republicans, and most of its congressmen are Democrats.

On Nov. 3, mid-Atlantic voters will elect three governors, five senators and 92 congressmen.

Going strictly by the form chart, Republicans should gain congressional seats this year in the five-state area.

In New York alone—thanks to the latest redistricting by a Republican legislature and the retirement of several incumbent Democrats in marginal districts — the GOP has high hopes of picking up six more seats.

But if past elections had followed the logic of political arithmetic, Democrats would have fewer seats than their 26 House seats in New York and fewer than 52 seats in the mid-Atlantic region. And Republicans would have more than 15 House seats in New York and more than 40 in the five states.

By the form charts, Henry Helstoski wouldn't be completing his third term from New Jersey's 9th Congressional District, compiling in the process an unblemished 38-0 "right" COPE voting record.

His 1964 squeaker victory in a traditionally Republican district could be explained by the Johnson landslide that year. And it was a bit of a surprise when he managed to hold his seat in 1966—still by a margin of under 3,000 votes.

But a redistricting law passed by a Republican legislature over a Democratic governor's veto certainly should have finished him off in the 1968 election. To top it off, his Republican opponent helped write the redistricting, bringing in still more GOP voters.

So Nixon carried the district by a top-heavy 53 percent of the vote, to 41 percent for Humphrey and 6 percent for Wallace.

And the liberal Helstoski? Well, he pulled through with his customary 2,300 vote plurality.

Can he do it again? And can other liberal Democrats with similar survival experiences do it again?

Such questions go to the very heart of the 1970 congressional election campaigns.

At least two other New Jersey districts held by Democrats are being sharply challenged and Republicans are mounting a heavy campaign in the Paterson area for Alfred E. Fontanella, who is trying to unseat Rep. Robert A. Roe, who narrowly won a special election last year.

In New York, redistricting makes Democratic Rep. Allard K. Lowenstein an underdog to keep the Long Island seat he won in a 1968 election upset. It also threatens four-term Rep. John M. Murphy in a Staten Island-Brooklyn district, and Rep. James M. Hanley, who lost most of his old territory and acquired an even more heavily Republican area.

The Democratic senatorial primary gives the GOP a chance to pick up another two House seats.

Richard L. Ottinger, who won the primary, will not be seeking re-election and the normally Republican district was made even more Republican by redistricting.

A loser in the Democratic senatorial primary, three-term Rep. Richard D. McCarthy, will not be able to run for re-election. Democrats nominated Thomas Flaherty and McCarthy first sought to run as an independent, then endorsed Flaherty. In this suburban Buffalo area, Republicans picked a glamour candidate, Jack F. Kemp, known to everyone in the area as the longtime quarterback for the Buffalo Bills professional football team.

Redistricting brought about an unusual contest between two incumbents in the Albany-Schenectady area. Democratic Rep. Samuel S. Stratton will face Rep. Daniel E. Button, who has an even more liberal voting record in the House.

One of two new districts without incumbents is certain to go Democratic—former Bronx Borough Pres. Herman Badillo has no GOP opposition. In an upstate district, Republican John H. Terry is favored, but Democrat Neal P. McGurn has proved a strong campaigner.

Democrats see a good chance that John G. Dow will recapture the seat he lost to Republican Martin B. McNeally in 1968 in a suburban and rural area. And Republicans hope that Bella Abzug will prove too controversial in a normally safe Democratic Manhattan district.

In Pennsylvania, it would take a major upset to change the present 14-13 Republican edge in House seats by more than one seat either way.

If Democrat Gus Yatron, who won his House seat two years ago with strong labor support, holds on to the early campaign lead most observers give him, there shouldn't be any Democratic losses. And 74-year-old Republican Rep. George A. Goodling remains a slight favorite over his Democratic challenger, Arthur L. Berger.

Delaware would have to change its conservative voting pattern to allow Democrat John D. Daniello to upset a Republican with the name of Pierre S. duPont IV.

In the mid-Atlantic area, the best chance for a Democratic pickup appears to be in Maryland.

Here, two of the four Republican seats appear to be clearly vulnerable.

Freshman Rep. Lawrence J. Hogan, who broke the Democratic hold on the district in 1968, is in a tight race against State Sen. Royal Hart, a liberal Democrat who has mounted an aggressive campaign. The district's population is concentrated in the Washington, D.C., suburbs.

A traditionally Republican area of western Maryland is likely to return a Democrat this year, according to early political reports. If so, he will be State Sen. Goodloe E. Byron. The Republican incumbent J. Glenn Beall, Jr., is running for the Senate.

The closest Democratic race is expected to be in a Baltimore district including both city and suburban areas, where Parren J. Mitchell will seek to become Maryland's first black congressman.

Democrats Run Strong In 5 Senate Contests

Republicans needs a conservative tide in the traditionally moderate-liberal mid-Atlantic area to keep alive the GOP's dwindling hopes for capturing the Senate.

Three of the five Senate seats up for election in the five-state area are currently held by Republicans and early campaign reports had the two Democratic senators seeking re-election listed as "vulnerable."

But as of mid-October, GOP candidates were betting favorites only in Pennsylvania and Delaware. Democratic incumbents in New Jersey and Maryland and the Democratic challenger in New York were given the edge in most political reports.

Thanks to Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew, the nation's most widely-publicized Senate race is the three-way battle in New York.

Before Agnew tried to read incumbent Sen. Charles Goodell out of the Republican Party as a "radical-liberal," the consensus was that Democrat Richard L. Ottinger would lead the balloting, followed by Conservative Party candidate James L. Buckley, with Goodell trailing.

Even though Goodell had the endorsement of the state's Liberal Party—which often holds the balance of power in New York politics—most lower-case liberals were lined up with Ottinger. And the state's trade union movement, although split on the gubernatorial race, is overwhelmingly for the Democratic senatorial candidate.

In effect, Buckley is now the Agnew-Nixon candidate in New York. Goodell is supported by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller—but not to the point of weakening Rockefeller's own re-election campaign — and more actively by Sen. Jacob K. Javits and New York City Mayor John V. Lindsay.

Ottinger showed impressive strength in the New York Democratic primary, using television effectively to achieve statewide recognition. And with a COPE record of 34 "right" votes, 2 "wrong" votes, his position on issues is firmly staked out.

Goodell may benefit from Agnew's attack. But if he draws anti-Agnew votes away from Ottinger, the beneficiary is likely to be Buckley—the man Agnew is trying to help.

And more than one political analyst has suggested that just such a result is what Agnew had in mind all along.

Of such imponderables are New York elections made, and political control of the Senate decided.

Across the Hudson River in New Jersey, Harrison A. Williams, Jr., is breathing a bit easier in his race for a third term in the Senate—thanks in part to the ineptness of his challenger, former Republican State Chairman Nelson G. Gross.

Williams—70 "right," 1 "wrong" on COPE's scorecard—is the author of the occupational safety and health bill, the sponsor of major bills to help senior citizens, and may be the next chairman of the Senate Labor Committee.

His campaign has picked up momentum and Gross is now looking outside the state for needed help. He has asked Agnew to campaign for him and Pres. Nixon chose New Jersey as one of the first states in which he made openly political appearances.

Nixon carried the state—narrowly—in 1968 and Gross appears to be pinning his hopes that the coattail still has carrying power.

In Pennsylvania, Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott is favored to win a third term despite a vigorous but low-financed campaign by Democrat William G. Sesler.

Scott took a big step in mending his political fences by admitting early in the campaign that he made "a damn fool mistake" when he voted to confirm G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court.

Sen. Joseph D. Tydings won election to the Senate from Maryland six years ago by unseating Republican J. Glenn Beall.

Now he is running against the son of the former senator, J. Glenn Beall, Jr., a freshman congressman who has made few ripples on the political scene in either state or national affairs.

But Tydings has—leading the drive for one man, one vote apportionment, speaking out as well as voting on controversial issues, carving out an independent political role that has won him both strong supporters and powerful foes.

The gun lobby singled him out as its chief purge victim because of his support for a moderate gun registration bill.

Against all this, Tydings has proved an effective campaigner. And running as part of a strong Democratic ticket, he remains the favorite in a hard contest.

Delaware is the only-mid-Atlantic state in which the incumbent senator is not a candidate. After four terms, Republican John J. Williams is stepping down. But an equally conservative Republican, two-term Rep. William V. Roth, Jr. is the front-runner to succeed him.

Big-State Governorships at Stake

In political terms, the stakes are high in the gubernatorial elections in New York and Pennsylvania.

Both states are scheduled to lose two House seats as a result of population shifts reflected in the 1970 census. And the governors will have a lot to say—backed by their veto power—about whether the redistricting will squeeze out Democratic or Republican congressmen.

Likewise, leading a big-state delegation into a political convention may not be a king-maker role for a Republican governor in 1972. But a Democratic governor of New York or Pennsylvania would be in a strong position at his party's convention.

In New York, either Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller or Democrate Arthur J. Goldberg could probably win handily over a lesser-known opponent.

Rockefeller has picked up important new endorsements and has proved anew his effectiveness as a campaigner.

Goldberg's campaign got off to a slow start, but he has some important arithmetic on his side. In the 1966 gubernatorial election, Rockefeller won handily but was held to 44.6 percent of the vote in a four-way contest. Paul L. Adams, the Conservative Party candidate, received 510,000 votes and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., on the Liberal Party, received 507,000 votes.

This year, Goldberg also will be running on the Liberal Party ticket while Adams will again be the Conservative Party candidate, presumably draining off Republican votes.

But no one around New York politics is selling Rockefeller short.

In Pennsylvania, incumbent Republican Gov. Raymond P. Shafer is ineligible to succeed himself and his lieutenant governor, Raymond J. Broderick, will face Democrat Milton J. Shapp.

Shapp lost to Shafer four years ago, but that race and his successful primary campaign this year have probably made him the better known of the gubernatorial candidates. He has taken the offensive in a hard-hitting campaign and both candidates are expected to use television heavily in the windup of a close race.

Maryland is the only one of the three states with gubernatorial elections with a Democratic incumbent. And by all accounts, Gov. Marvin Mandel will keep his job.

His Republican challenger is C. Stanley Blair, former aide to Vice Pres. Agnew. Agnew's campaigning may help Blair's fundraising. But it is not likely to shift any votes. Agnew won the governorship four years ago only because of the "frontlash" votes of liberal Democrats who couldn't stomach their party's candidate that year.

Drops Tax Loophole:

Senate Unit Okays Revised Trade Bill

the House Ways & Means Committee and is scheduled for a House vote when Congress reconvenes in mid-November.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the Administration's proposal risked the loss of up to $1 billion-a-year in federal revenues "in the hope of gaining an uncertain, but at best, marginal increase in exports."

It would result in "a windfall tax bonanza to corporations already engaged in export trade," regardless of whether their export sales increase, decline or remain stable, the federation charged.

At the same time the Administration is seeking a new tax concession for big corporations, it is asking continued or increased excise taxes paid by consumers, the AFL-CIO noted—"a double standard in tax philosophy."

The trade bill, given tentative Senate committee approval by a 9-3 vote, includes mandatory quotas on importation of textile and shoes.

But it departs from the House bill in dropping both the DISC proposal and another Administration proposal for repeal of the "American selling price" customs valuation on certain types of chemicals.

The Senate committee, at the urging of Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.), used a not uncommon maneuver of tacking unrelated legislation onto a major bill that is unlikely to be vetoed.

The base bill is the House-passed social security increase, which the Senate committee voted to double from 5 to 10 percent.

Although the committee has not yet concluded action on a variety of other social security changes, it voted to add the trade bill to the legislation. And it is expected, after the congressional recess, to tack on also at least a pilot program of welfare-reform, family assistance legislation.

When the omnibus bill reaches the Senate floor, not likely before late November, it would be wide open to amendments. And if it is near adjournment, other senators may try to add other unrelated bills that could be considered in a House-Senate conference.

Despite Administration opposition, most Republicans on the Senate Finance Committee joined with most Democrats in approving the trade bill. Earlier, during the two days of committee hearings, the Administration seemed to be speaking with two voices. Secretary of State Rogers warned that U.S. import restrictions would result in retaliation by other nations causing "serious harm to the United States." But Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans told the committee, "I question whether we would lose any exports."

Meany Schedules Election Broadcasts

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will make two nationwide radio broadcasts on "The worker's stake in the 1970 elections."

Both broadcasts will be on the Columbia Broadcasting System's radio network. They will be aired at 7:35 p.m. (Eastern time) on Thursday, Oct. 22 and Thursday, Oct. 29.

Since some stations may carry the broadcasts at different hours, individual CBS stations should be contacted for the exact local broadcast time.

CLOTHING WORKERS dedicate another day care center to serve pre-school children of ACWA members in the Chambersburg, Pa., area. This new $750,000 facility will be operated by the union's Baltimore Regional Joint Board, which also runs centers in Virginia and Baltimore. Another center is operated by the ACWA in Chicago and an additional center is under construction in Hanover, Pa. Clothing manufacturers pay 2 percent of their payroll into a health and welfare fund that finances the joint administration of the centers. ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, right, and Baltimore Joint Board Manager Sam Nocella cut the ribbon at the opening of the Chambersburg center. Below, children test a playground turtle at the center.

Tariff Study Confirms Job Losses From Foreign-Assembly Loophole

A study by the U.S. Tariff Commission has confirmed most of the cases offered by organized labor on the export of jobs through the foreign assembly of U.S. goods, but the study draws conclusions that the AFL-CIO finds unwarranted.

The report, ordered by the President 14 months ago, deals with two sections of the tariff schedule which allow for reduced duties on goods assembled in foreign countries from components shipped from the United States.

Under one section, the firms are allowed to subtract the value of U.S.-fabricated components from the duty on the total product. The other section covers base metals manufactured in the United States and shipped abroad for processing, allowing their return with duty paid only on the value of the foreign processing.

The AFL-CIO has argued for repeal of both sections of the tariff code, citing the loss of $50 million annually in tariff revenues as well as the encouragement for U.S. firms to export jobs to countries with some of the lowest wages in the world.

The newly-completed study confirms the AFL-CIO arguments on several counts:

- The value of items covered by the two tariff sections has risen dramatically in recent years, from $953 million in 1966 to $1.8 billion in 1969.
- 121,000 jobs are lost to U.S. workers by the practice of shipping components to foreign countries, with only 37,000 jobs still remaining in the United States for the portion of work done here.
- Repeal of the two sections of the tariff schedule would probably bring no "retaliation" from countries doing business with the United States under trade agreements.
- The U.S. consumer gains little in reduced prices from the system, with most of the money saved from low foreign wages going to increased profits.
- Electronic equipment, apparel, toys and dolls are the principal U.S. materials involved under the special duty provisions. Aircraft and automobile parts amount to less than 2 percent of the total.

Despite all this, the commission concludes that there is little to be gained from repealing the two tariff sections. For instance, while citing 121,000 jobs exported and 37,000 left at home, the study says "repeal would probably result in only a modest number of jobs."

The AFL-CIO agrees that the entire problem of the export of U.S. jobs would not be solved entirely by repealing these two tariff provisions, but contends that repeal would stop this incentive for the export of jobs.

Similarly, the commission reports that the savings on duties is not the main reason U.S. firms use the system of foreign assembly, concluding that repeal wouldn't stem the tide of exported jobs.

AFL-CIO economists agree readily that it's the low foreign wages, not the reduced import duties, that account for a lion's share of the profits, but sees no reason to add a $50 million windfall in reduced tariff schedules.

The study came three years after the AFL-CIO Executive Council began calling attention to the foreign assembly of U.S. goods as a hub around which companies, especially multinational firms, were exporting U.S. jobs.

South Carolina Unions Fight New Restrictions

Columbia, S.C.—A panel of labor representatives will testify before a conference committee of the state legislature this month seeking to guarantee full union rights for public employes in the state.

More than a week of hearings will be held on the issue which stems from a campaign by Gov. Robert E. McNair for enactment of new laws restricting public employe unions in organizing and collective bargaining.

Presenting labor's case will be representatives of the State AFL-CIO, the Fire Fighters, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and the State, County & Municipal Employes.

The legislature is expected to take up the issue of public employe unions when it reconvenes next January.

A concerted effort by labor to block the restrictive legislation sought by McNair was launched at the 14th annual convention of the South Carolina AFL-CIO.

The 227 delegates to the convention held in Charleston also called for repeal of the state's "right-to-work" law and the adoption of state minimum wage of $2 an hour. South Carolina currently has no minimum wage law.

In his report to the convention, Pres. Sinway Young noted that affiliated unions in the state have increased their membership 34 percent during the past year to 66,000 members.

Young also reported that the Apprenticeship Outreach program launched by building trades unions last summer has succeeded in placing 10 minority youths with the crafts. A first-year goal of 90 minority worker placements has been set and is expected to be achieved without difficulty, he said.

Young and Sec.-Treas. E. T. Kirkland were re-elected to new two-year terms. Both officers have held the posts since the state federation was founded 14 years ago. The convention also elected Melvin Burris to succeed L. B. Knox as a vice president of the state body.

In other action, the convention:

- Endorsed congressional legislation for a national health insurance plan.
- Called for passage of the occupational safety and health bill now before Congress.
- Urged increased benefits for the elderly under social security.
- Increased the state federation's college scholarship grant from $300 to $500.

M. Hedley Stone Dies, Maritime Union Pioneer

Lakewood, N.J. — M. Hedley Stone, a founder and former treasurer of the National Maritime Union, died Oct. 7 at the age of 73.

He was active in organizing the union in 1937 and was secretary-treasurer of its Great Lakes district until 1940 when he was elected national treasurer. He served in that position until 1956.

that have undermined workers' earnings under the previous scales.

Minton termed the resulting settlements "the best ever negotiated in the glass container industry."

Production and maintenance workers have already ratified their new contract and machine operators were scheduled to vote on their pact later.

Production and maintenance workers at four Owens-Illinois plants on the West Coast are covered by a separate contract, still to be negotiated.

Industry-wide negotiations were conducted in the past, but this year some firms announced they were breaking away from the employer bloc.

In 1968, the GBBA struck 17 glass container manufacturers, including Owens-Illinois, for 51 days.

The new Owens-Illinois agreements, in addition to the wage boosts, provide a ninth holiday, adding Dec. 27 to the Christmas season break, which is now extended to four days starting Dec. 24. Five more days of vacation are provided in the contracts for workers with 25 years of service or more.

Pension benefits will be increased to $6 a month, times years of service effective Feb. 1, 1972, and to $7 a month a year later.

The new agreements permit retirement with full benefits at age 60 and early retirement with 70 percent of full benefits at age 55. Pension benefits also were improved for retired workers already on the pension rolls.

Heading the union's bargaining teams were GBBA Sec.-Treas. Newton W. Black and Vice Pres. Harry Tulley of St. Louis.

Consumer Measures Cleared by Congress

House, and the House accepted them as part of a conference report.

One of the bills is aimed at protecting the credit standing and reputation of people who may find themselves blacklisted because of incorrect or incomplete adverse information furnished by credit reporting agencies.

The consumer would have the right:

- To be told of the reasons for a credit, insurance or employment turndown based on an adverse credit report and to be given the name and address of the reporting agency.
- To be informed of all information in his credit file by the credit reporting agency, and to be told who has received reports on him.
- To have inaccurate or unverified information removed from his file and to have information reverified if he disputes its accuracy.
- To file an explanation of any disputed items and to have his statement included on subsequent reports.
- To have all adverse information more than seven years old removed from his file.
- To be informed of the scope and nature of any investigations into his personal life.

The other consumer bill prohibits the distribution of all unrequested credit cards, limits a consumer's liability for purchases made with a lost or stolen card to $50, and bars any charge for purchases made after the loss of the card has been reported.

The rail passenger bill would set up a government-backed corporation to take over inter-city passenger trains—and, hopefully, stem the massive abandonment of passenger service by the nation's railroads.

Through a variety of record-keeping and reporting requirements, the foreign bank secrecy legislation is aimed at uncovering large sums of money deposited abroad. Numbered Swiss bank accounts—with the name of the depositor kept secret—have been used to "launder" money from illegal sources and then channel it back under the guise of loans or intricate financial transactions as well as to conceal assets from the tax collector.

The Senate ended its pre-election session as far away as ever from passage of the proposed equal rights for women constitutional amendment.

It voted several changes from the House-passed measure and its sponsors indicated they may abandon the effort to muster a two-thirds vote to pass the amendment close to its original form and seek to substitute a rewording of the 14th Amendment.

Most unions and a number of women's groups have opposed the amendment because it would nullify protective labor and social legislation.

GOP Politics Scored On Safety Bill Delay

tempted to put the blame on the shoulders of the Democratic majority and organized labor."

The Senate filibuster was the latest episode in the Administration-employer efforts to sidetrack a strong safety-health bill.

Earlier, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson had told newsmen that he would rather have no bill at all than one which put full responsibility for standards and enforcement in his department.

And Nixon had publicly chided congressional Democrats for failing to act on occupational safety and health—even though it was Republicans who were refusing to support the legislation cleared by House and Senate committees.

Meany had termed the safety-health bill the "most important" legislation before Congress."

Senators had been told well in advance that the bill would be taken up on Oct. 12, two days before the scheduled adjournment.

But the excuse given by GOP opponents for blocking consideration was that the bill was "too important" to be hastily considered, that senators needed "more time" to read it and understand it.

A New York Times story indicated another reason, as follows:

"Privately, Republican senators explained that one reason they did not want the bill considered at this time was to prevent Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) from getting a campaign issue in his re-election bid."

Williams is the chief sponsor of the bill and was scheduled to be the floor leader in steering it to Senate passage. He is also a prime target of Administration efforts to defeat Democratic senators and capture control of the Senate.

The tactic used to keep the job safety-health bill off the Senate floor was the same used earlier this year to sidetrack the constitutional amendment on presidential election reform, and in past years to block civil rights bills and a vote on repealing the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Its key is the "unlimited debate" that makes it impossible to take a vote so long as one senator wants to speak.

First Republicans objected to the customary unanimous consent request to take up the bill.

Then, when Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield made a motion to take up the bill, a handful of Republicans proceeded to "debate" the motion.

It didn't have to be a full-blown filibuster. After a five-hour "debate," it became clear that the bill could not be acted on before recess.

2 Key Growers In Salinas Area Sign Contracts

Salinas, Calif. — Two major growers in the Salinas Valley signed their first contracts with the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

After more than a month of difficult negotiations, Freshpict Foods, Inc., a subsidiary of Purex Ltd., reached agreement with UFWOC Oct. 7. The contract was signed two days later.

On Oct. 8, Delores Huerta, vice president and chief negotiator for UFWOC, started negotiations with Pic 'N Pac, a subsidiary of S. S. Pierce Co. of Boston. Those negotiations were concluded in one day.

Pic 'N Pac is the largest strawberry grower in California and also grows lettuce and spinach in the Oxnard area.

Both contracts call for a $2-an-hour minimum wage with a 10-cents-an-hour increase for the second year. The Pic 'N Pac contract also guarantees at least $2.20 an hours during the picking season.

The contracts also provide for employer contributions of 10 cents an hour to the union's health plan and five cents an hour to its development fund.

Both contracts are basically similar to that signed earlier with Inter Harvest. All three firms originally had signed contracts with the Teamsters, but rescinded those agreements after mass walkouts by the farm workers who are members of UFWOC.

In other developments in the Salinas Valley, UFWOC protested the lockout and suspension of 300 grape pickers at Alamaden Vineyards who had objected to the use of four grape picking machines, each of which displaces 30 workers.

Employer Group's Staff Upheld on Union Rights

Working for an association of employers doesn't necessarily constitute "confidential" employment, the National Labor Relations Board found in ruling that such employes are eligible for union representation.

The board directed that an election be held among a unit of office employes of the Pacific Martitime Association on whether they want the Office & Professional Employes to represent them as collective bargaining agent.

The Pacific Maritime Association, which handles labor relations for its member companies, had sought to block the election, contending that its employes were "confidential" since they work on labor matters on behalf of the member companies.

"We have held that employes of labor organizations are not confidential," the board said. "We see no persuasive reason why this standard should not be extended to an employer representing management interests in collective bargaining."

When the classification "confidential" has been allowed, the board said, the relationship has been in terms of an employer's own employes, not those of a third party as in the case of the companies belonging to the Pacific Maritime Association. "It is clear that the labor policies that make up the bulk of the employer's day-to-day activities do not deal with rates of pay, wages, hours of employment or other subjects of collective bargaining of the employer's own employes."

The OPEIU petition for an election had covered the association's headquarters in San Francisco. The association argued that the principal office alone did not constitute an appropriate unit since it also has area offices in Los Angeles, Portland, San Francisco and Seattle.

The board rejected that argument, ruling that the area offices in the other cities were largely autonomous. But it did say that the headquarters together with the San Francisco area office constituted an appropriate unit, since the employes shared the same building and administrative facilities.

The board agreed with the association contention that "paycheck distributors" should be exempted from the unit since they are "part-time workers, hourly paid, separately supervised and do not work in the same office." The distributors deliver weekly paychecks to longshoremen, stevedores and other employes of association member-companies in the San Francisco area.

The Railway & Airline Clerks and Northwest Orient Airlines have agreed on a neutral mediator to help in developing a settlement of their long dispute. The clerks have been on strike against Northwest since July 8.

BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis praised the efforts of former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey in helping bring the parties together to make use of the services of a mediator.

Dennis said the company had proposed a list of several names for the union to consider in the mediation process. As a result, Frank B. Marzitelli of St. Paul was jointly selected to assist the parties in negotiations. Marzitelli is an executive of the St. Paul Port Authority and a former member of the St. Paul city council.

AIFLD Graduates Urged to Seek Total Development of Latin Nations

Twenty-two trade unionists from 11 Latin American nations heard labor, government and business leaders urge them to put their recent training to the service of "not only trade union and political development" but to the "total development" of their communities and countries.

Dr. Herman Kleine, acting deputy U.S. coordinator for the Alliance for Progress, told the 33rd graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development that they must use their newly acquired expertise in industrial relations to assume key roles in the economic and social developmental process in their countries.

In presenting diplomas to graduates of the six-week program at Front Royal, Va., AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said that by their "different backgrounds—from clerk to fireman, mechanic to accountant"—the unionist-students exemplified the "brotherhood" of trade unionism, the "making of many one."

"It is the person—the people—who are important," Beirne said, and urged graduates to better their people's condition by giving "whatever new insights and strengths you may have gained from your experience here."

In response, Aurelio Villani of Brazil, speaking for the class, said the new knowledge acquired by the graduates would be "immensely useful to our trade union movements" and help them "unfurl the banner of free trade unionism and be in the vanguard of all battles for peace and social justice."

Villani spoke of the "discrimination and the struggle for survival in the American job market" experienced by minorities in this country, and added, "We hope and strive for equality of opportunity and equal rights for all the workers of the world; in fact, for one world."

Enno Hobbing, staff director of the Council of the Americas, told the graduation luncheon audience that labor-management cooperation is the cornerstone of the economic system.

"The business community looks to the trade union movement" as its chief ally in the pursuit of "our two common goals — economic growth and human liberty," Hobbing said.

In a presentation from the class to the AIFLD faculty, Juan Francisco Alfaro of Guatemala dedicated a rubber tree already planted on the Front Royal campus as a "living symbol of the growth of our own labor movements and activities" fostered through the AIFLD training programs.

Meany Hits 'Phony Issues,' Views Election as 'Crucial'

Nixon 'Game Plan' Flops:

New Price Surge Cuts Real Wages

Another surge in the consumer price index has further eroded workers' buying power in September and proves the utter failure of the Nixon Administration "game plan" for the American economy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The reaction came in the wake of the Labor Dept.'s report that the August-to-September cost of living jumped five-tenths of 1 percent in September. Before seasonal adjustment, the increase was four-tenths of 1 percent above the previous month.

"These figures mean that in the 20 months of the Nixon Administration's so-called anti-inflation program, the cost of living has risen more than 10 percent," Meany said. He also noted that unemployment among the nation's workers climbed nearly 2 million since Pres. Nixon took office.

"In the past year alone," Meany pointed out, "the buying power of workers still employed has dropped $1.59 a week."

He referred to the real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect the consumer price changes—which slipped to $77.68 a week, down 83 cents from August and $1.59 from September 1969.

The $1.59-a-week decline in buying power is the severest since 1964 when the Bureau of Labor Statistics first began its series of reports on earnings.

Real spendable earnings for a worker with three dependents reached an all-time high of $79.86 a week in September 1968. Last month's level is $2.18 below that high mark.

Inner Cities Hit Hard by Jobless Rise

Workers in urban poverty areas were hit hard by rising unemployment during the three months ended last Sept. 30. The Labor Dept. recorded a jump in their jobless rate to 8.3 percent from 5.7 percent for the same period of 1969.

The sharpest increase was for Negro teenagers, whose jobless rate surged to 34.9 percent from the 29.3 percent a year ago. There was little change in unemployment for white teenagers, which was at 17.7 percent in the third quarter.

But most of the increase in joblessness in the inner-city poverty areas occurred among adult men, both black and white, the BLS said. The rate for Negro men rose from 3.9 percent to 7.9 percent, and for white men the climb was from 2.8 percent to 5.1 percent.

Overall, the jobless rate in poorer neighborhoods of the nation's 100 largest cities climbed to 6.6 percent

Nursing Home Abuse Termed U.S. Scandal

Far too many nursing homes subject their patients to abuse and unsafe conditions, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman charged as he called on regulatory agencies to correct the "flagrant dereliction in enforcement of federal standards."

"It is a national scandal that public funds today too often support nursing homes where large numbers of patients live in filthy fire traps, neglected and without hope," Seidman declared.

He noted that about 80 percent of the nursing homes receiving federal funds are in violation of state standards and that at least half of the homes operating under Medicaid have serious deficiencies.

Appearing at a forum on nursing homes and problems of the aging, conducted by Rep. David H. Pryor (D-Ark.), Seidman said that the outrageous defiance of state and federal laws on nursing home standards must stop.

"Federal agencies which have been given the responsibility of assuring decent standards of care for thousands of neglected, ill and lonely elderly Americans must be given the funds and authority to discharge that mandate," Seidman stressed.

He noted that almost three-fourths of the estimated $2.4 billion spent on nursing home care

Modest Gains Made In State Legislation

By John R. Oravec

A mixture of victories and setbacks marked labor's efforts for progressive social programs in the state legislatures this year.

Overall, there was no significant anti-labor legislation adopted by the states. The setbacks came mainly in areas where labor-supported bills failed to win passage.

Labor's gains included improved unemployment benefits and workmen's compensation programs. There also was advancement in minimum wage standards, notably in New York where the base rate was boosted to $1.85 an hour—25 cents higher than the federal standard.

Protection of union rights for public employes was strengthened in several states. Two of the nation's best public worker laws were enacted in Hawaii and Pennsylvania.

Little progress was made in gaining significant on-the-job health and safety standards, pointing up the need for a federal law. Only Alaska made a breakthrough with a "red tag" law that authorizes the shutdown of a dangerous working area.

Three states adopted legislation that weakened or repealed labor laws for the protection of women. And a few states approved increases in property and sales taxes over labor's staunch opposition.

While unemployment benefits were increased in 14 states and workmen's compensation improved in 13, the improvements generally fell short of labor's objectives and underscored the need for federal standards in both areas.

Here is a brief summary of the actions of state legislatures meeting

Pins Slump On Policies Of President

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany blamed the nation's economic slump on the Nixon Administration's "shortsighted" policies and urged America's workers to vote for COPE-endorsed candidates who will "get on with the job of building America."

Labor is supporting congressional candidates who will fight for programs of "full employment, fair wages and stable prices," Meany said in a nationwide radio broadcast. (Text, Page 7.)

"Don't be misled by phony issues and phony promises," Meany stressed.

The Administration and its candidates, he charged, have resorted to "inflammatory rhetoric" to divert attention from the real issues of the campaign.

Instead of the 5 million new jobs the President promised, unemployment is up by nearly 2 million, Meany noted. Prices have soared and high interest rates are "feeding inflation and starving production and con-s'ruction."

He termed the Nov. 3 elections "crucial" to lifting "the burden of recession and inflation" from the backs of workers and consumers.

Conservative candidates for the House and Senate couldn't hope to be elected by promising "more of the same," Meany noted.

So they are seeking to sweep the facts under the rug and they are running on phony issues.

"They are running against 'big spending' as if progressive candidates favored spending for its own sake.

"They are running against 'crime

Administration Scored On 'Pro-Worker' Pose

The Nixon Administration isn't building any "bridges" to American workers by trying to sabotage a strong occupational safety and health bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared.

He was asked, in a broadcast news interview, about Administration efforts "to form a political alliance . . . with organized labor."

Biemiller replied, "Sure, the Administration is trying its best to convince working people in this country that they are its friends. . . . But the way this Administration is going about it, they are certainly not doing it."

The job safety-health bill is labor's "number one target" when Congress returns in a post-election session, Biemiller said. It was blocked in the Senate by Republican delaying tactics before the recess and it will be a "nip-and-tuck" battle to "get a good bill through" this year.

The "big issue," Biemiller stressed, "is whether or not the Secretary of Labor should have the power to promulgate and en-

Tough Laws, Court Injunctions Held No Solution to Public Sector Strikes

Punitive state laws and court injunctions simply do not work in settling disputes between teachers and school boards, and between other groups of public employes and their superiors in stalemates at the bargaining table.

That is the main finding of a new analysis of teacher strikes made public by Chairman Ramsey Clark of the National Committee for Equal Justice for Public Employes. Clark was attorney general in the Johnson Administration. He recently assumed the chairmanship of the committee, which issued an appeal for recognition of the rights of public employes to bargain collectively for their own betterment.

The analysis, written for the committee by Bruce Agnew, focuses on the plight of 186 Newark teachers who either went to jail or are appealing jail sentences ranging from 10 days to three months. They were charged with staging a work stoppage last February in violation of state law and court restraining orders.

The strike, the author says, did more than put some teachers in jail.

"It dramatized a dilemma that is of growing concern on every level of government in the United States, from the smallest municipality to the White House itself—whether public employes, be they teachers or trash collectors or postal employes or police, should be given the right to strike."

The easy answer, and the one which most public officials tend to give automatically, is "No," the study notes.

"Public employes, the argument runs, are servants of the people. If they go on strike, they are in fact striking against the welfare of the people.

"In fact, they are dangerously challenging the very basis of authority in society."

The analysis observes that "the argument seems to have a certain logic. A little tough on public employes, of course, but the community has to come first."

The trouble with this approach, as the author found in his examination of the Newark school strike, is that it doesn't work.

"The threat of an injunction barring a strike did nothing to avert the walkout. In fact, it probably helped make a strike inevitable. School board negotiators made it clear throughout the bargaining that they didn't fear a strike; they would stop it by injunction.

"Enforcement of the injunction by court officers, who arrested striking teachers, did nothing to break the strike, once it had started. It simply made the teachers more determined.

"They got mad. And the school board didn't even save money. The final agreement was more costly than the settlement the board probably could have made before the strike . . . by as much as $8 million or $9 million a year."

The analysis concludes: "The Newark school injunction accomplished one thing: it proved, in a good test case, that the use of no-strike laws or injunctions against public employe strikes does more harm than good—to everybody."

Agnew's report relates the experiences of a number of the Newark teachers who were arrested.

Mrs. Beth Rufalo, a vice president of the Newark union, told the author she survived the ordeal of a month in jail by not thinking too much about her three children, left with baby-sitters when her husband was at work. The other prisoners treated her with respect and cried when she was released before her three-month sentence had been served, she said.

AFT Pres. David Selden served 43 days in the same prison for the same offense. Once the arrests of picketing teachers had started, Selden left Washington for Newark and notified city officials he was coming. They were waiting for him when he arrived.

Robert Bates, an AFT negotiator who served on the Newark bargaining committee, knew trouble was coming when the teachers joined the union and finally voted to walk out.

"School boards always think they can go to court and get an injunction," Bates said. "So they think they don't have to bargain, and good people get mauled."

The study notes that "teachers have gotten mauled by no-strike laws and court injunctions in many places besides Newark—Woodbridge, N.J., New York City, Boston, and in Illinois, North Dakota, Indiana, Rhode Island, Maryland."

Goal of the campaign, being undertaken in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., is to encourage consumers to buy steel products bearing the USWA label.

C. L. Dennis Appointed To Retirement Panel

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks has been named to a new Railroad Retirement Commission which Congress established to study the financing of the retirement system.

Also appointed to the commission by Pres. Nixon were John P. Hiltz, chairman of management's National Railway Labor Conference, and Theodore O. Yntema, a retired Ford Motor Co. vice president. Two other members will be named by the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate. The commission is to make its report by next July.

After 3-Day Strike:

Teachers Return In Philadelphia

Philadelphia—A union representing 16,000 public school teachers and aides ended a three-day strike and returned to classrooms with a compromise offer of settlement from the school board.

Spokesmen for Local 3 of the American Federation of Teachers said a court order and a fine of $75,000 a day for the duration of their walkout gave them little choice in the matter.

Union members had walked out of class in 227 of the school system's 275 buildings after prolonged bargaining talks conducted by Gov. Raymond P. Shafer at the state capitol in Harrisburg broke off. It was the first strike in the history of the nation's fourth largest school system.

Local 3 members continued picketing after school officials secured an anti-strike injunction. A three-judge panel affirmed the injunction but rescinded the $75,000-a-day fines when union representatives and the school board agreed to resume negotiations under procedures of a new state law.

A major unsettled contract issue is the length of the teaching day for high school teachers. Others are wages, the teacher's accountability for the progress of pupils, and verification of illness during sick leaves. If the parties cannot reach agreement within 10 days, the law provides for fact finders to make recommendations which neither side is compelled to accept.

In other contract disputes, teachers stayed on the picket line in East St. Louis, Ill. Other AFT locals, forced back to work by judges' orders, continued to struggle for acceptable contracts with foot-dragging school boards.

In East St. Louis, 750 of the regular staff of 900 teachers have been on the picket line for nearly 60 days—the longest walkout in the school district's troubled history. The school board won a court injunction limiting pickets to four at each school and mandating negotiations every Monday, Wednesday and Friday until the walkout is ended.

The work stoppage began Aug. 30 when union teachers turned in their resignations to the board, six of whose members are under indictment for overspending last year's budget.

Main issue in the strike, said Pres. Don Miller of AFT Local 1220, is the board's failure to live up to its agreement last year to reduce the district's debt by $500,000 or more because of increased state aid. The union is willing to settle for a 6 percent cost-of-living increase provided the board reforms its spending policies.

Teachers in all other districts affected by AFT work stoppages are back in school. Last to return were Inkster, Mich., teachers. They are continuing negotiations under a court order which set the school board's last salary offer as the base for setting pay in the 1970-71 school year.

Strikers who returned to work by compulsion in Toledo, O., Nashua, N.H. and Somers, Conn., continued to seek contract settlements by negotiation.

During AFT work stoppages in September, teachers were jailed in New Haven, Conn., Toledo, Somers, Nashua and Lakeland, N.Y. The jailings were called "an abuse of judicial power to coerce public employes" by AFT Pres. David Selden, who served a jail term himself for walking a picket line in Newark, N.J., last spring.

Coalition Asks Hearings on Voucher Plan

A newly-formed coalition of groups concerned with education has asked the House and Senate to hold hearings on a controversial "voucher plan" the Office of Economic Opportunity wants to try out.

The plan would give parents vouchers that could be used for private school tuition as well as public school enrollment.

The request for hearings was made by the co-chairmen of the 17-member Alliance of National Educational & Religious Groups, Carl Megel of the American Federation of Teachers and Dr. John M. Lumley of the National Education Association.

The AFL-CIO had termed the voucher plan when it was first presented "one of the most bizarre proposals yet to emanate from within the Nixon Administration."

An Administration task force described the voucher system as one means "of both accelerating institutional change and providing an appropriate education for urban students." One of the task force members was Sidney P. Marland, Jr., whose nomination as U.S. Commissioner of Education is pending in the Senate.

POSTAL UNIONS and management meet in the first stage of their new collective bargaining procedure to seek agreement on reduction of the time required for postal workers to move from the starting salary to the top of their pay grades. Officers of all seven unions holding national exclusive bargaining rights are taking part in the negotiations. Full collective bargaining, covering pay, benefits and working conditions in the U.S. Postal Service, is scheduled for mid-January.

At Cement Workers Convention:

Kirkland Assails Nixon Smokescreen

San Diego—The Nixon Administration is trying to conceal the true issues in the election campaign with a smokescreen of fear and prejudice, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged.

Addressing delegates to the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers convention here, Kirkland said labor's job in the final days of the campaign is "to see that our members and their families and friends are not misled."

The nation's course over the next two years, Kirkland stressed, "will depend largely on how well the trade union movement succeeds in mobilizing its strength" and bringing it to bear on the real election issues of unemployment and inflation.

"Our aim is to get America back to work, to get the national economy moving again, and to restore to it as quickly as possible a decent measure of justice."

Kirkland charged that "since the Nixon Administration took office, the American economy has operated for the benefit of an economic elite. It has enriched the banks and concentrated the nation's wealth in fewer and fewer hands."

With one out of seven construction workers jobless, and unemployment at 5.5 percent, the nation appears headed for a 6 percent unemployment rate by Christmas, he warned.

Against this backdrop of economic failure by the Administration, Kirkland said, the "radical conservatives" are using "high octane rhetoric to convince us that our friends are really our enemies."

He charged that much of the fear and frustration the conservative candidates are playing on "is a direct product of the social and economic havoc" resulting from their own policies.

Kirkland said the election results will determine the immediate outcome of labor's "top legislative goal" of a national health insurance program.

The labor movement believes, he said, that "the right to live in health cannot any longer be treated as a privilege of the rich, or as an optional extra that anyone can forego if he can't meet the price."

He said the labor movement does not intend to lose the battle for national health insurance, "but to win it, we must first win the election."

Kirkland and I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers and of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., sharply attacked the Nixon Administration and its spokesmen in Congress for blocking action on labor-supported occupational health and safety legislation.

More Americans are killed on the job every year than have died in Viet Nam, Kirkland noted. "A victory for labor's friends in the election will help tremendously in getting this bill passed."

Abel also assailed policies encouraging concentration of unrelated industries into a handful of corporate conglomerates.

Thousands of workers have lost their jobs, he said, because corporate conglomerates have no understanding of the industries they take over.

In an opening day address, the executive secretary of the California State AFL-CIO urged union members to translate their political endorsements into effective work on behalf of the candidates they support.

In California, John Henning told the delegates, that means an all-out campaign to elect John V. Tunney to the Senate seat now held by Republican Sen. George Murphy.

Before the 280 delegates attending the weeklong convention was a full agenda of resolutions and committee reports. Convention committees were busy during the opening days of speeches and ceremonies.

TWA Walkout Wins Pact for Cabin Crews

New York—A one-day strike of the Transport Workers against Trans World Airlines won a new contract for 5,400 stewardesses and stewards after 17 months of talk had failed.

Negotiators agreed on new terms including a substantial wage increase after 19 hours of nearly continuous negotiations at National Mediation Board offices in Washington, D.C. The agreement will be put into writing and then submitted to members for a vote within about 10 days, the union said. Terms of the settlement will not be released until then.

Cabin attendants had been trying since early in 1969 to get an acceptable settlement from TWA. Their contract expired in March of last year, and talks dragged on under the lengthy processes of the Railway Labor Act, which also covers airlines.

The pace of talks stepped up when the walkout began Oct. 20. Picket lines were set up at major air terminals in New York, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles, and at other company locations in Pittsburgh, Kansas City and Phoenix.

All of TWA's 450 daily domestic flights were canceled after picket lines appeared, but the big air carrier announced plans to continue a few overseas flights with supervisors and imported stewardesses. After the settlement, TWA said all flights would be resumed by week's end.

Kentucky Labor Girds For Election Day Effort

South Fort Mitchell, Ky.—The Kentucky AFL-CIO chose a new president at its convention here, increased the per capita tax from 18 cents per member per month to 20 cents, and called on its members to conduct a "massive mobilization of personnel and resources to help assure victory at the polls" Nov. 3 for labor-endorsed candidates.

Some 367 delegates from 150 local unions and 11 city central bodies chose Leonard "Scottie" Smith of the Distillery Workers to succeed incumbent Pres. John E. McKiernan of the same union in a contested election.

Returned to office were Sam Ezelle of the Iron Workers as executive secretary-treasurer, a post he has held since 1952, and Charles Pero of the Brewery Workers as vice president.

The convention called on every Kentucky unionist to give top priority to political action and political education this year, described as "the most critical congressional election year in recent history."

The policies of the Nixon Administration and its agencies have, the convention declared, "led to an alarming increase in unemployment; at the same time prices continue to soar and diminish the living standards of Americans."

Failure to retain the "progressive preponderance" in Congress, the delegates warned, will bring the labor movement "to the brink of destruction . . . through the passage of laws aimed specifically at shackling workers and their unions."

Ezelle announced the opening of three union prescription centers in Louisville for the sale of drugs at low prices. The centers were opened early this month for the use of 45,000 Louisville area members. The convention authorized the state council to offer the same service in other areas for the benefit of 100,000 additional union members.

Convention resolutions proposed sponsorship by the state council of housing for senior citizens, urged passage of a law permitting public employes to organize and bargain, and asked all unions in the state to help get members to the polls on election day.

Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO told the delegates that, after a decade of fighting the Ku Klux Klan, the John Birch Society and now the Black Panthers, union members in his state are "tired of having demagogues dominate the political scene" and "we are working to change this."

N.Y. Delegates Affirm Support Of Rockefeller

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—With a handful dissenting, nearly 1,200 delegates to the reconvened session of the New York State AFL-CIO convention gave overwhelming reaffirmation to the Sept. 3 endorsement of Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller for reelection.

The convention also unanimously reelected Raymond R. Corbett, an Ironworker, for a fifth two-year term as president; Louis Hollander of the Clothing Workers for a similar term as secretary-treasurer and the 27 vice-presidents, also for two-year terms.

During its sessions last month the convention had made the endorsement by a standing vote. Although every member of the state body's executive council, including eight vice presidents who had favored the Democratic-Liberal nominee, Arthur J. Goldberg, agreed the vote call by Corbett was correct, some delegates disputed it and raised procedural questions.

To give adherents of former Labor Sec. Goldberg a further opportunity to vote on the issue, but with the proviso that the endorsement stand in the meantime, a pro-Rockefeller delegate offered a motion to reconsider, coupled with a motion for a recess of at least a month. The motion was accepted and the convention voted to recess.

At the reconvened session, Oct. 14, which was boycotted by some pro-Goldberg affiliates, the motion to reconsider the Rockefeller endorsement was voted down almost unanimously. Delegates from locals of two international unions which favor Goldberg, announced in advance they would abstain from voting.

Nebraska Labor Backs Full Democratic Slate

Hastings, Neb.—The Nebraska State AFL-CIO endorsed a full slate of Democratic candidates for key state offices and Congress at the 15th annual convention.

After intense debate by the 300 delegates, the convention threw its support to J. James Exon, former Democratic national committeeman, who is opposing incumbent Republican Gov. Norbert T. Tiemann in the Nov. 3 election.

Tiemann was defended for his favorable handling of a number of labor-backed programs, including improvements in workmen's compensation, unemployment benefits and recognition of public employe unions.

Exon has been opposing Tiemann on the state sales tax and income tax which has been instituted since Tiemann took office four years ago. Both gubernatorial candidates addressed the three-day convention.

Former Democratic Gov. Frank B. Morrison was endorsed in his effort to block conservative Republican Sen. Roman L. Hruska from winning a fourth term in the U.S. Senate.

In congressional races, the state federation is backing the election of Democrats George Burrows, 1st District; John Hlavacek, 2nd District, and Donald Searcy, 3rd District.

In several key resolutions the convention called for increasing the state minimum wage from $1 an hour to $1.60 and extending coverage to more workers; enactment of federal standards on workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits, and passage of a national health insurance program.

Double Handicap

Real Earnings Slashed As Living Costs Surge

ill-advised policy that has not stopped inflation or restored the health of the economy," Meany stressed. "This is an intolerable situation," and it's worsening, he added.

"The answer for America is the election of a Congress which will adopt policies and programs—despite Administration opposition—which will achieve full employment, fair prices, realistic interest rates and make the economy healthy again," Meany suggested.

The seasonally adjusted cost of living increase of five-tenths of 1 percent pushed the consumer price index to 136.6. This means it costs a worker $13.66 for goods and services that he could have bought in the 1957-59 period for $10.

Higher prices for consumer services, clothing, and housing accounted for almost all the over-the-month increase, the BLS noted.

Although food prices declined one-tenth of 1 percent from August, the drop was less than usual for the season. This resulted in an increase of four-tenths of 1 percent after seasonal adjustment. Non-food commodities rose six-tenths of 1 percent after seasonal adjustment.

Overall, the cost of housing also rose six-tenths of 1 percent, pressed by higher prices for houses, mortgage interest and home repairs, and rising property taxes, said Dr. Joel Popkin, assistant commissioner of the BLS.

Transportation costs were up three-tenths of 1 percent from August, with fare increases coming in airline flights and local buses. Auto insurance and the price of gasoline also increased over the month.

The cost of used cars declined 1.4 percent, while new cars dropped only four-tenths of 1 percent—both less than usual for the season, the Labor Dept. noted.

Charges for medical care and other personal service continued to rise in September.

About 70,000 workers will receive wage adjustments because of the rise in the CPI for September. These include about 26,500 in the aerospace industry, 18,000 airline mechanics and about 13,000 busline employes.

About 9,000 other workers with escalation clauses in their contracts tied to the September price increase will not receive adjustments because they have already reached the stipulated maximums.

Gross weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers dropped 84 cents over the month to $121.36. The Labor Dept. attributed the decrease to a reduction of six-tenths of 1 hour in the average week, caused partly by the occurrence of the BLS survey period during the Labor Day holiday week.

Penn Central Bid for Wage Freeze Rebuffed by Two Railroad Unions

The bankrupt Penn Central Railroad will not be allowed to make its 50,000 employes the scapegoats for inefficient money management, two rail union leaders announced.

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks and Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes challenged a claim by Penn Central trustees that a wage increase for employes this year would be "unrealistic."

The claim was made as a three-member presidential emergency board continued its efforts to get a wage settlement with all major railroads before Nov. 4, the extended deadline for reaching voluntary agreement. If the board fails, union members will be free to take strike action after 30 days, and management will be free to lock out its clerks, waymen, dining car employes and United Transportation Union members.

Dennis said in a statement that about 20 percent of Penn Central's union employes "already have received a wage increase for 1970, and all of Penn Central's management and supervisory personnel have received salary increases for 1970."

He called it "highly unrealistic for the trustees to believe that they will be allowed to take their cash flow out of the hides of workers who have waited since last Jan. 1 for a legitimate increase in wages. They will not be allowed to do that."

Dennis said "no corporation has the right to exist" by paying substandard wages "and this union warns Penn Central that it had better forget such nonsense."

Crotty expressed the belief that Penn Central, which is a party to the current wage negotiations, is subject to the same rules as other railroads and can ask no special privileges because it filed a bankruptcy petition.

Penn Central employes total nearly a fifth of the 400,000 union-represented workers who have been trying for many months to negotiate a wage hike from their employers.

Negotiators for the four unions point out that Penn Central, the largest U.S. railroad, has some $7 billion in assets and can if necessary sell some of them to meet its obligations. In addition, they report, the Penn Central president continues to draw his $165,000 yearly salary; the four trustees in bankruptcy will be paid up to $300,000 a year for their time and the road's many vice presidents average $60,000 a year each in salary.

To Cope With Problems of '70s:

State Governments Urged To Update Creaking Systems

Washington—State governmental machinery needs major updating to deal with the rapidly changing problems of the United States, an article in the October issue of the American Federationist declares. The article, "Our Creaking State Governments" criticizes restrictive state constitutions as the primary cause of ineffective and inadequate state government.

The author, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair, points out that state problems have become increasingly complicated, especially in such areas as federal-state relations, education, health, welfare, roads, unemployment insurance, and workmen's compensation.

He argues that "because of constitutional restriction of their powers, governors and legislatures are virtually impotent in effecting reasonable solutions." Governing bodies are denied authority to expand state services on a priority basis and obtain needed revenues except through regressive tax measures, he observes.

As an example, Fair notes that the constitution of Alabama earmarks 87 percent of all state revenue for specific purposes. As a result, the governor and legislature are allowed discretion in selecting priorities for spending only 13 percent of the state's income.

Fair also cites the 1963 constitution of Michigan, which provides that gasoline taxes "be used exclusively for highway purposes as defined by law." He charges that although rapid transit is a virtual necessity in major metropolitan areas today, constitutional restrictions such as this prevent the use of any gasoline tax revenue to develop a rapid transit system.

Again using Michigan as an example, Fair recalls that the school lobby there, taught by experience that it might not always get the money it needed, pushed for fixed revenue sharing for educational purposes. But the share of funds designated for this purpose in the 1963 Constitution is now proving insufficient and the provision remains a political handicap to obtaining adequate funds.

The article also criticizes a number of state constitutions that restrict the power of the state to borrow. For example, the Wisconsin constitution requires that borrowing in excess of $100,000 must be approved by the people.

Constitutional restrictions are only part of the problem, Fair observes, noting that many state lawmaking bodies "remain unchanged from a century ago—long before the modern era of transportation and communication."

Many of the state legislatures are far too large, Fair maintains. Eight states have legislatures with 200 members or more, and only ten have legislatures with 100 members or less.

The article points out, too, that most legislators do not have professional research staffs and must rely on partisan information. Fair suggests that with a counseling staff responsive to the legislators, the number of committees and committee assignments could be reduced, and each member could become reasonably expert in the matters before his committee.

Another serious restriction on the ability of many state legislatures to cope with problems of the 1970s is the short session that limits the time needed to deal with complicated legislation. Fair comments that "anyone who has sat through the waning hours of a session with the clock stopped knows the present system in many states is not conducive to clear judgments and legislation that is well thought through."

He suggests further that legislators' salaries must be high enough to permit them to serve as long as necessary without requiring another source of income.

Fair also calls for an end to secrecy in the legislative process. He recommends that names and votes of members be recorded and published on all committee and floor actions and that notice of all committee hearings and a statement of subjects to be considered be published in advance.

"Secrecy," Fair observes, "not only destroys public confidence in our legislative process but in our republican form of government."

In another area, the article cites the limited authority of many governors as a cause of weakness. The governor, as the state's chief executive officer, is held responsible for the efficient and effective administration of state government, Fair notes, but in many states he does not have the authority to appoint administrators. Some are appointed for long terms, and are responsible neither to the governor in office nor to the public. Some are elected, and as political creatures, their decisions are determined by their impact on the next election.

Guild Ratifies Contract Ending N.Y. Post Strike

New York—By a nearly unanimous vote, Newspaper Guild members ratified a new three-year contract with the New York Post and returned to work after a 15-day strike.

The agreement gives 375 Post white-collar employes the same 41.69 percent benefit package accepted earlier by other unions at the Times, Daily News and Post. It is notable mainly because of improvements in conditions the Guild has been seeking for years, according to Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy of the New York local.

The strike was the first ever called by the local against the Post. The settlement was the Guild's first on any New York daily in negotiations that started last March. It was achieved with the help of Mediator Theodore W. Kheel and with the active participation of Mrs. Dorothy Schiff, publisher.

Next move for the Guild will be to seek settlements also from the Times and Daily News.

The Post contract provides wage boosts of 15 percent this year, retroactive to Mar. 31, and additional hikes of 11 percent in each of the last two contract years, compounded. Under it, every employe gets the same dollar increase as those at the top of each salary classification.

The Post agreed to continue contributing $4 a week into the employe pension fund but added a new option. Retirees at any age after 60 may take severance pay in a lump sum or draw the money in an annuity over a 15-year period, in addition to a pension.

Under the new pact, the publisher will pay future increases in the cost of health and hospitalization insurance. Also provided is job protection in any move by the company to set up satellite publishing plants.

The pact contains improvements in clauses covering sick leave, promotion, automobile mileage of 13 cents plus paid liability insurance, no callbacks during vacation periods, better arbitration provisions and bereavement leave.

Management agreed to match any shortened work time agreed to by the Times. It granted speedier settlement of grievances and approved a Guild request for a higher wage differential of $10 this year, plus another $5 next year, for employes in a new category including columnists, assistant city editors and editorial makeup men.

Union Men Named To Aviation Panel

The Civil Aeronautics Board named seven union men to a new board which will advise CAB Chairman Secor D. Browne on matters of interest to employes of the airline industry.

Pres. Charles H. Ruby of the Air Line Pilots is chairman, and Webster B. Todd, Jr., special assistant to the CAB chairman, is secretary. Members are Presidents Victor J. Herbert of the Air Line Employes, a Pilots' affiliate; Robert E. Commerce of the Air Line Dispatchers; C. L. Dennis of the Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks; William A. Gill, Jr. of the Flight Engineers; Vice Presidents W. W. Winpisinger of the Machinists and James F. Horst of the Transport Workers.

Browne said in announcing the appointments that he feels "the resulting broadening of communication and input to the board's thinking" on aeronautic developments will be "most beneficial." Appointed at the same time were members of a consumer affairs board and a financial advisory committee.

Modest Progress Made in Legislatures

Improvements Still Far Short Of Labor's Program in States

this year gathered in an AFL-CIO News survey:

ALASKA—In the 147-day record-breaking session of the state legislature maximum benefits in workmen's compensation were raised from $113 to $127 a week for both temporary and permanent disability. Increased contributions by employers also were ordered in the second injury fund under workmen's compensation.

On job safety, the legislature established a "red tag" law that gives the state commissioner of labor the authority to close down a dangerous work site. A new railway safety act requires full crews on trains operating within the state.

ARIZONA—Labor successfully supported the passage of an amendment to the State Industrial Compensation Act that blocks lawsuits against a co-employe who may have been involved in the cause of the accident.

Despite opposition of labor, the legislature repealed the "Women's 8-Hour Law" that required the payment of time-and-one-half beyond regular working hours.

CALIFORNIA—Tax reform was the main issue in the 1970 session of the legislature. While Democrats and liberal groups were attempting to enact a withholding tax and bring tax relief to the poor, Republicans and Gov. Ronald Reagan's forces were seeking to cut taxes for corporations and the wealthy. The GOP tax proposal was defeated, but labor and the Democrats also failed in passage of their tax reform measure.

DELAWARE—A state department of labor was established by legislative action. The new department is responsible for the state divisions of employment services and unemployment insurance. Maximum weekly benefits under unemployment insurance were raised from $55 to $65 a week. The weekly maximum payment for disability under workmen's compensation was boosted to $75 from $50.

FLORIDA—The ceiling on jobless benefits was boosted from $44 to $47 a week effective next Jan. 1. The legislature also raised maximum weekly payments under workmen's compensation for death and disability from $49 to $56 and increased the minimum weekly amount from $8 to $12. These increases went into effect July 1.

GEORGIA—A minimum wage law setting a $1.25-an-hour base rate was adopted by the legislature—short of labor's goal but considered an important first step.

Several other bills backed by labor died during the session. And the legislature defeated a bill to give fire fighters union rights for organizing and bargaining.

HAWAII—The 1970 session of the legislature is being hailed by labor as the most productive for workers in the state's history. Hawaii's new public employe collective bargaining law is viewed by state labor officials as the best in the nation.

The legislature enacted a $100 million housing package that provides mortgage loans through the state housing authority. It also voted a pay increase for many state workers, state election law reform and legal protection for fire fighters. Workmen's compensation for disfigurement was raised from $10,000 to $15,000.

IOWA—Labor-backed measures to increase benefits under workmen's compensation, improvements in the state child labor law and bargaining rights for public employes were passed by the state legislature.

But labor was unsuccessful in blocking a repeal of sales tax credit for Iowans earning less than $7,000 a year and changes in the state election law that purged lists of registered voters every three years instead of four.

Improvements in workmen's compensation include increases in weekly benefits to 46 percent of the state's weekly average this year and to 50 percent next July 1. Compulsory coverage, unlimited nursing care and increased burial expenses are also provided by the new law.

KANSAS—A 5 percent limit on property tax increases was imposed by legislative action. The new law also allows cities or counties to levy a sales tax up to 1 percent and provides for a 2 percent state income tax. While increasing the tax on beer and cigarettes, the legislature also imposed a 2.25 percent surtax on corporations and financial institutions.

Improvements in workmen's compensation raised weekly benefits from $49 to $56, hospital and medical coverage from $8,500 to $10,500 and death benefits from $16,500 to $18,500—with additional payments for dependent children up to a maximum of $25,000.

KENTUCKY—Considering that Gov. Louie B. Nunn vetoed six of the 16 labor-supported bills passed by the legislature, the State AFL-CIO noted in its legislative report that labor did "remarkably well" in the 1970 session.

On the plus-side for labor, was the updating of the 1968 prevailing wage law; safety standards on glass used in construction work; a "homestead" exemption to give persons over 65 relief on property taxes; removing the 5 percent state sales tax on prescription medicine and items needed by the handicapped, and additional appropriations for hiring the handicapped.

Improvements in workmen's compensation include provisions for the injured worker to choose his own doctor and hospital, a "black lung" program for mine workers, and payment of unpaid claims to widows and orphans rather than cancelling out the claims after a worker dies.

LOUISIANA — The legislature approved increased payments for the jobless and improvements in workmen's compensation, while defeating several anti-labor proposals.

Maximum weekly unemployment benefits were increased this year from $50 to $55 and to $60 next Aug. 1.

Anti-labor attempts were blocked on a "right-to-work" proposal, repeal of the prevailing wage law, the lifting of the tax-exempt status of unions if funds are used for political action.

The Louisiana AFL-CIO was successful in leading the campaign for the passage of a $122 million tax program that provides for wage increases for public employes and funds for public education and mental health.

MARYLAND—Jobless benefits were raised from $60 to a maximum of $65 a week. Increases were voted under workmen's compensation for permanent partial disability, boosting the maximum payment to $35 a week and the minimum to $25. Coverage was also extended to a number of state and county employes.

Labor succeeded in blocking passage of legislation that would have wrecked dental programs established by unions, repeal of the prevailing wage law, limiting campaign contributions of unions, and a gimmick that would have allowed employers to whittle down the state unemployment insurance fund.

MICHIGAN—A bill to boost the state minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.45 this past July and to $1.60 next July 1 was enacted despite Republican delaying tactics.

A party line struggle also saw Democrats succeeding in raising minimum jobless benefits $7 to $53 a week and maximum benefits $11 to $87 a week. The bill also provides extended coverage to match the new federal law during periods of high unemployment.

A Republican-backed bill was defeated that would have imposed severe penalties against public employes for striking. These included mandatory court injunctions, decertification, loss of dues checkoff and fines.

The legislature voted increased appropriations for mental health programs, higher education and state school aid.

MISSISSIPPI—One major accomplishment was the Senate's defeat of a bill that would have prohibited public employe strikes.

Labor was successful in legislation to have Mississippi participate in the Medicaid program and in establishment of a statewide educational system.

NEW YORK—The state minimum wage was raised from $1.60 an hour to $1.85. Increases were also approved in unemployment benefits and workmen's compensation.

Maximum weekly benefits for temporary disability were hiked from $85 to $95 and for permanent disability from $70 to $80. Unemployment insurance benefits were raised from $65 to $75 a week.

In the area of consumer protection, the legislature raised from $30 to $85 a week the amount of earnings exempt from garnishment. But 10 percent of the wage above $85 may be deducted by the employer to pay off a worker's debt.

The legislature adopted a bill, strongly opposed by the State AFL-CIO, that repealed all protective laws limiting the numbers of hours women over 21 may work.

OHIO — The Republican-controlled legislature was scored by the state labor body for failing to enact added protection for workers while increasing "unfair" consumer taxes.

Lawmakers in the highly industrialized state held unemployment benefits at $55.63 a week for a family of four. At the same time, an average family will have to pay an additional $38 a year in new taxes.

OKLAHOMA—While increasing the weekly maximum payments for unemployment compensation from $38 to $49, the legislature reduced the maximum duration of benefits from 39 to 26 weeks. Slight increases were approved under workmen's compensation.

PENNSYLVANIA — Collective bargaining rights were approved for public employes and workers in non-profit institutions. The law does not prohibit strikes, but spells out mediation and fact finding procedures that must be first exhausted. The passage of the law capped a 15-year effort by labor.

The legislature suspended payments to disabled miners who qualify for federal benefits under the 1969 Mine Health & Safety Act. But they may be reinstated after federal benefits run out.

RHODE ISLAND — Increased jobless benefits were approved to raise the maximum payments from 50 percent to 60 percent of the average weekly wages covered by the unemployment insurance program.

SOUTH DAKOTA—The maximum weekly benefit for unemployment was increased from $41 to $47.

Disability payments under workmen's compensation were boosted to a maximum of $50 a week and a minimum of $27, from previous levels of $44 and $22 respectively. The limit on aggregate costs of medical, surgical and hospital care was boosted from $20,000 to $75,000.

TENNESSEE—Jobless benefits were increased from a maximum of $47 a week to $50. The taxable wage base on unemployment insurance will be raised next Jan. 1 from $3,300 to $3,600.

VERMONT—Efforts to shift the authority of the State Dept. of Labor & Industry to the Justice Dept. were blocked by Democrats in the House. But the legislature approved a bill repealing the law that prohibited women from working more than 60 hours a week.

VIRGINIA — Jobless benefits were raised from a weekly maximum of $48 to $59. The legislature also raised the weekly maximum payments under workmen's compensation from $51 to $62.

But measures to assure union rights for fire fighters and to prohibit "blacklisting" of public employes who go on strike were defeated.

WASHINGTON—Although an overhaul of the unemployment compensation law increases maximum weekly benefits from $42 to 50 percent of the average state wage, more stringent standards makes it difficult for many workers to qualify. The new rate brings benefits to $72.

The sales tax was increased to 5 percent in many areas of the state as the legislature authorized cities and counties to impose an additional levy.

Measures to improve benefits under workmen's compensation died in the House despite almost unanimous passage in the Senate.

WEST VIRGINIA—The eligibility for claims under workmen's compensation based on disability from "black lung" disease was improved.

Improvements also were made in the unemployment compensation law, raising benefits from 40 percent to 50 percent of the state average weekly wage.

ELECTION SUPPORT of Ohio Democratic gubernational candidate John J. Gilligan, center, is affirmed with a handshake by Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters at a press conference in Cleveland. McClennan praised Gilligan for his years of effort on behalf of programs to improve public safety. At left is Ed Haggerty, president of the Ohio State Fire Fighters Association. McClennan also appeared at rallies in support of labor-endorsed U.S. Senate candidates Sen. Frank E. Moss, Utah; Sen. Vance Hartke, Indiana; Rep. John V. Tunney, California; and Howard Metzenbaum, Ohio.

BLS Surveys Show Value of Union Card

Two recent surveys by the Bureau of Labor Statistics underscore the value of union membership.

In a survey of wages in miscellaneous plastics products manufacturing plants in August, 1969, the BLS found that the average union worker received $2.49 an hour. The average non-union worker in the industry earned only $2.30 an hour—8 percent less.

The second survey—of the straight-time earnings of wood household furniture workers in October 1968—showed the average hourly wage under union contracts to be $2.27, 16 percent more than the non-union wage of $1.95 an hour.

Pact Signed With Retardation Group

A new memorandum of understanding has been reached by the AFL-CIO and the National Association for Retarded Children to promote closer ties between labor and those working in the field of mental retardation.

The agreement was signed by AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis and NARC Executive Vice Pres. Arthur Hull Hayes. It outlines steps to be taken by each organization to encourage increased labor participation and to maintain union-approved working standards for NARC employes, including the right to organize and bargain collectively.

Get Out the Vote!

THERE IS WIDESPREAD agreement on one aspect of the 1970 election campaign that crosses party lines and ideological differences: the extraordinary degree of apathy reported by candidates, campaign managers and the media.

The indifference that permeated the campaign up to the last 10 days or so was signalled earlier in the year in the low voter turnout in most state primaries.

It is underscored further by the reports of the various polling organizations that find the undecided vote in the polls at least twice as large as is usual at this stage in the campaign.

The major push of the last few days should improve the situation. But it is entirely possible that the key issues of the next few years, and of the decade, may be shaped with a relative minority of the electorate taking part.

THE CENSUS BUREAU estimates that there will be about 124 million persons old enough to vote in the Nov. 3 elections—an increase of four million over the 1968 figure.

But in 1968 only 60.8 percent of the voting age population cast ballots. The turnout in non-presidential years historically tends to be lower. So that it is entirely within the realm of possibility that less than one-half of those old enough to vote will go to the polls on Nov. 3.

This would be a sorry record, indeed, for a nation that prides itself on its democratic heritage and achievements.

While no one can question the right or freedom of any person not to vote, the widest possible participation would more thoroughly enable the new Congress to fashion the programs and enact the laws that will represent the thinking and desires of the country.

The apathy, the indifference, the fall-off in voter turnout in the non-presidential years put a greater burden than ever on the trade union movement to exert its maximum effort to get-out-the-vote on Election Day.

EVERY EFFORT must be made to carry the message of the crucial importance of the elections in light of the economic record of the Nixon Administration in the past 20 months.

From January 1969 to September 1970 consumer prices have increased 10 percent, unemployment 72 percent, interest rates on FHA home mortgages 21 percent. The stock market has dropped 16 percent, home building 21 percent and the buying power of a factory worker's weekly pay by 2 percent.

This record is no basis for apathy or indecision or an "it-doesn't-really-matter" attitude. It calls for a massive turnout at the polls to elect a new Congress that will set it right; to let the Administration know that new programs, new policies are needed.

A Word Edgewise:

New Analysis of Radical Left Points Up Basic Opportunism

By John P. Roche

ONE OF HISTORY'S greatest, and most tragic, ironies was that in Russia the Bolsheviks seized power in 1917 by harnessing to their cause the discontent of the peasantry—considered by all good Marxists the most reactionary element in society.

It is usually forgotten that Lenin and Trotsky did not overthrow the tyranny of the Czars, but triumphed over a weak, divided, almost hopelessly disorganized democratic government. Almost the first action of the victorious Communists was to disperse by arms the Constituent Assembly, the first democratically elected body (and, alas, the last so far) in Russian history.

Since that time, we have witnessed a number of movements which have tried to imitate Lenin by capitalizing on whatever major sources of discontent exist in society. Some were right-wing; Mussolini, originally a left-wing Socialist, consciously drew from the Communist example; and it might be recalled that the full name of the Nazi party was "National Socialist German Workers' Party."

Others remained on the left, although—since they took their inspiration from Moscow—left in fact became East. But invariably they were opportunistic in the full sense of the word. That is, they attempted to profit from any opportunities that presented themselves—there is, for example, good reason to believe that right now Moscow is encouraging right-wing Croatian separatists in the effort to undermine Tito's Communist regime.

At a time when the headlines in the United States emphasize bombings, riots, the reports of the Scranton Commission on Campus Disorder, Vice Pres. Agnew out whooping it up against the "radic-libs," and the prospect of Louise Day Hicks meeting Bella Abzug in the Women's Lib restroom of the House of Representatives, it is wise to stop and take a close look at the world around us.

For those interested in this sort of dispassionate analysis, I strongly recommend "The Radical Left: The Abuse of Discontent," edited by William P. Gerberding and Duane E. Smith (Houghton, Mifflin). A collection of essays, the volume suffers from the usual trials and tribulations of variegated authorship. After reading Renata Adler's spectacular and penetrating description of the National New Politics Convention, held in Chicago in 1967, it is a bit hard to struggle through the late Robert Waelder's "Protest and Revolution Against Western Societies." But the struggle is worth it.

The volume is divided into five sections dealing with "The New Left," "Intellectuals and Politics," "Students and the University," "Race," and "The Political System." The dominant need is clinical—the authors cut into these various problems in a surgical effort to assess the extent to which the radical left has utilized genuine grievances for its own ends. And the degree to which this opportunism has succeeded.

THE BOOK'S BASIC THRUST can be misconstrued as anti-intellectual—and will probably be denounced on this ground by the house scribes of the new left—but its basic charge is that the radical intellectuals have betrayed their trust, have abandoned reason in favor of revivalist fanaticism.

Those of us who have lived in both the intellectual and the political worlds know, to our dismay, that all too often if you scratch a radical intellectual, you find a holy roller. In this connection, the superb essay by Edward Shils, "Ideology and Civility: On the Politics of the Intellectual," is worth the price of the book.

Many readers have probably been touched by the request of the young that we restore their "faith in the System." Those who read this book will learn (as a number of us in the trenches have learned) that translated into operational English this means "Do what we say!" All in all, a useful collection to have on the shelf.

Makeup of New Congress Held Crucial to America's Workers

Following is the text of a special radio broadcast by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany entitled "The Worker's Stake in the 1970 Elections."

ON NOV. 3, America will go to the polls to vote in a crucial election—an election that will decide the composition of the 92nd Congress and the shape of this new decade.

The workers of America should cast their ballots on that day as if their jobs, their pocketbooks, their health and their families' future depended on the results. And the hard fact is that this is exactly the case. All of these—jobs, pocketbook, health and family security—are at stake.

In the last two years, America has moved backwards because of short-sighted and mistaken policies of the Nixon Administration.

Two years ago, Pres. Nixon promised to make America more productive; he said he would aim at creating five million new jobs.

A few months later, he promised to control the economy and cure inflation without "forcing American workers to pay for it with their jobs."

But the workers are paying. The burden of recession and inflation is falling on them, and on consumers.

There are not five million new jobs; there are nearly two million more unemployed today than there were when the Administration took office. And at the same time prices have soared to the highest level in history, and interest rates reached the highest point in more than 100 years. The high cost of money is feeding inflation and starving production and construction.

The things this nation needs to do are not being done, and all the Administration says is: America cannot afford them.

America needs better medical care, and the Administration says we can't afford it. America needs millions of new homes, it needs day-care centers, clinics, schools, parks and recreational facilities, and the Administration says America cannot afford them.

Workers just will not accept that argument. We have complete faith in America; we know America can afford the things its people need.

The answer lies in full employment, realistic prices, reduced interest rates, reasonable profits, sensible credit controls—all of the cures this Administration has spurned or abandoned.

In the light of the nation's experience over the last two years, this year's conservative candidates could not hope to be elected by promising more of the same—higher prices, higher profits, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

So they are seeking to sweep the facts under the rug and they are running on phony issues.

They are running against "big spending" as if progressive candidates favored spending for its own sake.

They are running against crime in the streets, as if those candidates who want to put America back to work are opposed to law and order.

They are running against so-called "permissiveness" as if forward-looking candidates—or any responsible American—were in favor of rioting, arson and vandalism.

Every candidate—and every responsible American, I am sure—wants to solve these problems, but they can't be solved by inflammatory rhetoric alone.

They can only be solved in an atmosphere of justice—economic justice, social justice, human justice.

AND THAT ATMOSPHERE will be achieved when Americans no longer fear the loss of their jobs, when they know they can afford to feed and clothe their families, when they are relieved of the fear of massive medical bills. In short, the candidates who will put America's house in order are the ones who can—and will—get on with the job of building America.

So my message to workers is simple—vote for your future . . . vote for your country's future. Vote for congressional candidates who share your faith in America.

Don't be misled by phony issues and phony promises.

What this nation needs—what you need—is full employment, fair wages and stable prices. I urge you to support candidates who believe in these things and who will fight for them. They are the candidates COPE is backing. They are the candidates who want to get on with the job of building America and making it a better place to live in for all Americans.

By voting for them, you will help yourself, your family and your country.

Agnew's 1970 Political Mission Recalls Nixon's Role in 1954

REPORTS FROM all sections of the country tell of TV spots in which films of past campus riots or ghetto disturbances blossom on screens from coast to coast as a narrator suggests that any voters who dislike what they see would do well to vote against a liberal incumbent or candidate.

It is only fair to note that the first intensive use of this technique in 1970 was a successful effort by a conservative Democrat to beat a liberal Democrat and a number of responsible Republicans are not associating themselves with this gambit.

On the national level, Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew is certainly the most conspicuous salesman of this line. As he goes from state to state, targeting in on one liberal incumbent after another, the script changes only slightly.

"Will we be intimidated and blackmailed into following the path dictated by a disruptive radical and militant minority—the pampered prodigies of the radical liberals of the United States Senate?" Agnew asks a San Diego audience.

"The senior senator from Tennessee is important only to the radical liberal wing of the Democratic Party," he says of Sen. Albert Gore to a Memphis audience. Here, he attacks Gore's vote against confirmation of G. Harrold Carswell's nomination to the Supreme Court.

In Michigan, where Republican Sen. Robert P. Griffin also opposed confirmation, Agnew does not mention Carswell.

There are striking similarities between the Agnew effort in 1970 and a similar chore performed by Vice Pres. Nixon for a Republican Administration in 1954. Both are based on "issues" on which there is only one side. There are no more responsible liberals today who are in favor of crime and violence than there were then liberals in favor of "selling out to the Kremlin."

"If Democrats win control of Congress, it will give a tremendous boost to the left-wing elements," Nixon told a Pocatello audience in 1954.

In both cases real concerns and legitimate fears are blamed illogically on political opponents. The high octane content of the "issues" has to do not with logic but with fear.

THERE ARE ALSO differences between the 1954 Nixon campaign and the 1970 Agnew campaign. First, 1954 was near the end of the McCarthy era, and the reflexes of a significant number of middle Americans failed to respond to the stimulus which had reached the peak of its effectiveness in 1950. On the other hand, 1970 is near the start of a period in which there are new and baffling concerns and fears. The "issue" is far from being worn out and voters may find it handy to express disapproval by voting against incumbents. That would make 1970 a very bad year for Senate liberals because so many of them are up for election this year.

Another difference is Agnew's direct courtship of the votes of blue-collar and white-collar workers, as part of a broad-based Administration effort.

"The time has come," Agnew told a Springfield, Ill., audience, "for someone to represent the working man of this country, the forgotten man of American politics."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AT THE TIME Pres. Nixon vetoed the bill that would have both lowered and tended to equalize the cost of political radio and television broadcasting, a White House aide admitted that the Administration had no other proposals in mind.

What emerged from the veto message was that while the President and the National Republican Committee are appalled by the cost of campaigning, they kind of like things as they are.

The way things are is that the Republicans today are raising at least three times as much as the Democrats and spending twice as much. The GOP is obviously the money party.

A move may yet be made to override the veto after Congress resumes its "lame duck" session Nov. 16.

The measure passed both houses by more than the two-thirds vote necessary for overriding, but expected White House pressure on all Republicans in Congress dims the prospect.

THE VETOED MEASURE would apply broadcast spending limits to candidates for President, Vice President, senator, U.S. representative, governor and lieutenant governor.

The limit would be seven cents for each vote cast in the previous election. The minimum ceiling would be $20,000. The limit for primary elections would be 3.5 cents a vote.

As a wealthy party, the Republicans would lose their vast monetary advantage under the plan. In 1972, for example, broadcast time in the general election would be limited to $5.1 million for each party. This contrasts to $11.5 million spent by the GOP in 1968 and $5.5 million by the Democrats.

There are other provisions of importance in the bill. One would require that TV and radio stations sell time to candidates at the lowest rate charged commercial advertisers.

The cost of presidential campaigns was generally about six to seven cents per voter until 1952 when television became a factor. That year the cost rose to 19 cents. It went up steadily to 29 cents in 1960, to 35 cents in 1964 and to a whopping 60 cents in 1968.

THE CONSIDERABLE WALLOP of TV cannot be understated. The Senate Commerce Committee reported that approximately 1.5 billion man-hours per week are spent watching television.

"Television," the committee report says, "has become the most accepted medium of mass communications in the United States. Ninety-five percent of all American homes have television sets.

"The airways, especially those used for television, now play a dominant role in political campaigning. During the 1968 Presidential election campaign, a candidate could with a single message lasting one minute, presented with one program, on one television network, reach as many as 23 million viewers of voting age—a number equal to almost a third of the votes cast in that election."

Two other critical points have been raised.

Senator Joseph Tydings: "The public is more and more aware that political success is tied to huge financial resources—and this fact widens the gulf between the represented and representative."

Editor Harry Ashmore: "The short-circuiting and paralysis of the traditional party system by the personalized politics of TV has cured some evils . . . but, so far, it has replaced them with a system that merchandizes candidates as though they were bars of soap."

How to Buy:

Confusion on Both Sides Seen In Debate on Cereal Nutrition

By Sidney Margolius

BY NOW the public is thoroughly confused by the controversy over the nutritional value of ready-to-eat cereals. You hear such comments from consumers as, "Those cereals have no nutrition at all." "I buy Total, the one that has nutrition." At the same time newspaper writers make such off-hand remarks as, "Cereal has about as much nutrition as dirty fingernails . . ."

Contributing to the confusion were (1) a well-meaning engineer-turned-nutritionist named Robert Choate who had a good deal of truth on his side but over emphasized the nutritional aspects; (2) a well-meaning but inexperienced Senate staff which brought up the problem but failed to put it into proper perspective; (3) the cereal manufacturers and their spokesmen who jumped on the loopholes in Choate's testimony about cereals before a Senate subcommittee and really confused the issue with a hypocritical smokescreen, and (4) the newspapers which sensationalized the controversy without investigating further to find the answers.

It really is unfair to raise these issues and then leave consumers dangling.

Choate was perfectly right in criticizing dry cereals widely-used today for their exaggerated TV advertising aimed especially at children and for their inflated prices.

But he confused the issue by rating various cereals on their content of seven nutrients, including some like vitamins C, D and A that you ordinarily don't expect cereals to supply and which are normally supplied by other foods. On the basis of this kind of classification, Choate's ratings ranked especially high such fortified cereals as Product 19, Kaboom, Total and Life which have added vitamins.

Actually, of course, most reasonably balanced daily diets which include fruit juices, vegetables, milk and other dairy products do not require these added vitamins.

But the cereal manufacturers and their defenders were the ones who really muddied the waters. For example, Dr. Frederick J. Stare, a Harvard nutritionist who often defends food processors, retorted that Choate's testimony ignored the fact that "95 percent of breakfast cereals are consumed with milk." If milk is the main nutritional value in eating dry cereals, then obviously there are other ways of drinking milk than with a spoon.

Even more misleading was the rebuttal to Choate by a Quaker Oats Co. official to the effect that if milk were added to the cereals, they would all have more food value than an egg, a slice of bread or a number of other common breakfast foods. This is really kidding the public.

A slice of bread (toasted or not) with some milk has as much nutritional value as many of the dry cereals with some milk.

Here are facts which may help to clarify the breakfast controversy:

● The most nutritionally complete breakfast for the money would be an egg (or a little meat), a slice or two of bread and a half-cup or more of milk (we'll assume vitamin C in the form of citrus or tomato juice).

● If you prefer cereal, the best value both nutritionally and financially is cooked cereal such as oatmeal. At a cost of a little less than two cents a serving (one third the price of many ready-to-eat cereals), cooked cereals provide somewhat more nutrition than dry cereals. A little of the original nutritive value of grains and cereals is lost in manufacturing ready-to-eat cereals.

● If you don't have even the one minute needed to cook a cereal, a slice of bread with some milk is the equivalent, at less expense, of the ready-to-eat cereals.

● If you prefer a ready-to-eat cereal, then buy the least expensive private brand, and preferably a whole-grain cereal. Buy the simplest form without added sweetening or other ingredients, and even without shaping. (Co-op wheat shreds only 25-30 cents a pound; shaped shredded wheat, almost twice as much.)

Presweetened cereals, which are usually 45 percent sugar, are more expensive and also provide less of the more-valuable nutrients. As we have pointed out many times, you pay for the sugar in presweetened cereals at the rate of 90 cents to $1.07 a pound.

● If you want a ready-to-eat cereal with extra nutrients at less cost than that of most fortified cereals, the bran cereals are very low priced and provide additional calcium and B vitamins (thiamine, riboflavin and niacin).

Hospital Sends $2,160 Bill For Fatally-Injured Man

San Antonio, Tex.—The soaring charges for medical care were poignantly illustrated in the case of an elderly traffic victim who died nine hours after he was admitted to the hospital.

But in those nine hours at Bexar County Hospital, George Smalley, Sr., is supposed to have received $2,160.88 worth of treatment, drugs and blood transfusions.

The four-page bill with 168 entries was sent to his son, George Smalley, Jr., although the elder Smalley was covered by Medicare, Medicaid, Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance. The hospital said the bill was sent out by mistake and that the four agencies would pay off the charges.

San Antonio News columnist Paul Thompson, who reported on the case, contacted two doctors and concluded on their comments that this was a "concrete and vivid example of how the medical establishment . . . soaks the taxpayer" by magnifying the cost of medical treatment under Medicare and Medicaid.

Safety Council Advises:

Defensive Driving Can Keep You Alive

THE DIFFERENCE between defensive and offensive driving can be the difference between living or dying, the National Safety Council warns.

The council offers a variety of tips and safety suggestions to keep workers and members of their families from becoming part of the grim toll of deaths and injuries on the highway.

Defensive driving, according to NSC Pres. Howard Pyle, "means a driver is aware of other motorists on the highway and ready at all times to protect himself by preventing an accident in spite of another's actions."

Other imperative parts of defensive driving, the council says, are beginning a trip early enough to prevent fast driving in reaching your destination, and the use of safety belts.

The council believes that the buckling of seat belts is a key to reducing the highway death toll.

"We have the statistics to know," Pyle said, "that a person's chances are five times greater for surviving an accident if this one simple precaution is taken."

Offensive driving, according to the council, is the use of such bad practices as following a car too closely, taking unnecessary chances in passing and speeding.

All of those death-bringing practices and many more are wrapped up in the greatest menace on the highways—the drunk driver. More than 56,000 motorists were killed in 1969 motor vehicle accidents, and in at least half of them, alcohol was a factor.

Recognizing that people do drink, the council's advice is: If you are going to drive, it would be better that you don't drink at all. Or . . . drink in such a manner that you will not be under its influence when you drive.

If you choose the second alternative, the council says, "wait at least one hour per average drink before driving. That's the minimum amount of time required by the body to rid itself of alcohol."

ANOTHER MAJOR CAUSE of accidental deaths is drowning. The council offers these water safety tips:

Never swim alone and be sure you know the depth of water you enter. Check boats for flotation cushions and life vests before you leave shore. Don't overcrowd boats. Don't stand in them. Don't risk getting caught in a storm.

Children in the water need watching at all times. They tend to follow drifting inflatable toys. If water-skiing is your bag, you need two in the tow boat—a pilot and someone to watch you. Always wear a life vest.

The council also has some suggestions for avoiding accidents in the home:

● When puttering around the house, don't overreach if you're on a ladder. Use a sturdy one and set it solidly.

● If you have a big job to do such as heavy hauling, get a neighbor's help. It's better than being laid up with a sprained back and you'll have a chance to reciprocate with later help for the neighbor.

● Keep kids away from the mower and all power tools when you're operating them. Shut off the mower when you're not using it. Take the wire off the spark plug. Never refuel a mower when it is hot. Make sure all power tools are properly grounded.

● Use safety glasses and wear safety shoes when doing dangerous home jobs. They make as much sense then as they do in the factory or plant.

The council warns that while home hazards are everywhere and some of them can't be anticipated, "You need safety sense at home as well as on the road."

How About Plain Old Meat Loaf For the Women's Lib Types?

By Jane Goodsell

WHEN A WOMAN buys her clothes with an eye to how they will impress other women, she may double-think herself into making some curious choices. So it is with cooking for other women.

The basic problem isn't that women don't try to please each other. It's the other way around. Our eagerness is our undoing.

How it works, as if you didn't know, is like this: say it's your turn to have the Tuesday Reading Club to lunch at your house next month. Well in advance of the date, you start racking your brains and combing your recipes in search of something nice to give them to eat.

Chicken salad? It's always good but that's the trouble with it. Perhaps if you added pineapple tidbits and a bit of chutney to the dressing, and served it in scooped-out pineapple shells—no, Harriet already did that. And Marjorie put grapes and almonds in hers. And last month Emily made that spectacular gelatin mold, decorated with pimento cheese balls rolled in coconut, spiced kumquats and cucumber boats stuffed with sliced radishes.

Coming after an artistic triumph like that, you certainly can't serve plain old chicken salad or cheese souffle or tomatoes stuffed with shrimp. Even if all these things taste delicious (and indeed they do) you'd be embarrassed to serve something so unoriginal.

WHEN YOU GET right down to it, food that is carefully chosen for quality and freshness, is attentively cooked, deftly seasoned and combined with regard for color and texture, is practically guaranteed to look, as well as taste, marvelous.

It doesn't require much adornment beyond a sprinkling of parsley, a dash of paprika or maybe a few lemon slices.

Oh, there's nothing really wrong with fluting the cucumbers and curling the carrot strips; and a few sprigs of parsley or mint look nice on a platter. But too many dainty little touches give food a fussed-over look that doesn't whet appetites. The trick is knowing when to quit.

It's okay to use a pastry tube, if you have one, to stuff the eggs but in that case it's best not to top them with little pyramids of mayonnaise crowned with curled anchovies. You might make them look too good to eat, and then nobody will.

Frontlash Voter Drive Welds Youth and Labor

While attacks on the American political system come from both the left and the right, Frontlash '70 is doing something constructive. The organization is actively involving youth and students in the democratic process and helping combat the "backlash" of reactionary trends that thrive on fear, frustration and voter apathy.

A non-partisan national voter registration and education group, Frontlash has utilized the energies of young people to register tens of thousands of voters since its inception in 1968. Working primarily in central city and minority communities, it seeks to educate voters on issues affecting their communities and to build alternatives to polarization and conflict.

Frontlash was established with the strong support of organized labor and coordinates its efforts with registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns of AFL-CIO and local central bodies.

Mountain, Plains Area Critical to GOP

Democratic Hopes Rise In Governorship Races

Ten Great Plains and Rocky Mountain states will elect governors on Nov. 3, and the political arithmetic points to a modest pickup for the Democrats.

Nine of the 10 states currently have Republican governors. And several of them are in obvious political trouble this year—not unusual among state chief executives who so often have to choose between unpopular tax increases and inadequate services.

The region's lone Democratic governor, Robert Docking of Kansas is also having a hard race for re-election.

No one is very mad at him, but he is challenging tradition by seeking to become the first third-term governor in the state's history. And his Republican opponent, State Atty. Gen. Kent Frizzell, has what a Congressional Quarterly election report termed "abundant" financial backing.

In neighboring Nebraska, Gov. Norbert T. Tiemann barely survived a conservative tax revolt to win Republican renomination and is given only the narrowest of leads over the Democratic candidate, J. James Exon.

South Dakota Gov. Frank Farrar is another Republican who has had trouble with his own party and barely won renomination. He also managed to antagonize both friends and opponents of rural electric co-ops with a fence-straddling position.

The state has elected only one Democratic governor in the past 12 elections, but State Sen. Richard L. Kneip is given a good chance to become the second.

With New Mexico Gov. David F. Cargo out of the political picture—he lost his bid for the Republican senatorial nomination—Democrat Bruce King has a good shot at the governorship. King, has been speaker of the State House of Representatives and has strong labor support. His Republican opponent is Pete Domenici, considered a political moderate.

In Idaho, a rematch of four years ago will pit conservative Republican Gov. Don Samuelson against liberal Democrat Cecil Andrus, with the result very much in doubt. Samuelson has opposed needed funds for education and backed industry plans for open-pit mining over conservationist objections.

Incumbent Republican governors of Arizona, Colorado, Oklahoma and Wyoming are considered front-runners. But none of them is so far in front as to preclude Democratic upsets.

In Nevada, where the politically potent Republican Gov. Paul Laxalt is retiring, Democrat Mike O'Callaghan is now given a chance to win the governorship. Republican hopes are pinned on Lt. Gov. Ed Fike, who earlier in the campaign had been considered well in the lead.

Poverty Areas Hit Hardest by Jobless Rise

for whites and 10.8 percent for blacks, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted. A year earlier, the unemployment rates were 4.4 percent for whites and 7.5 percent for Negroes.

The number of workers unemployed in poverty areas averaged 510,000, up about 150,000 from the third quarter of 1969.

While the jobless rate in poverty neighborhoods increased to 8.3 percent, the national unemployment rate in the third quarter rose to 5.2 percent from 3.7 percent a year earlier.

The increases in unemployment in the urban poverty neighborhoods came despite a decline in the civilian labor force in these areas. The decline is partly traceable to the movement of some workers out of the poverty areas.

However, in poverty neighborhoods where the labor force has remained relatively stable, the number of job holders has declined and the number of unemployed workers has increased, the Labor Dept. reported.

13-State Region Could Hold Key To Republican Control of Senate

By David L. Perlman

Republican hopes for capturing the Senate rest heavily on a sparsely-populated 13-state region from the Great Plains westward through the Rocky Mountain states.

The combined population of Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming is less than that of either California or New York.

But in the context of this year's election campaign, there's political gold in those prairie and mountain states.

This is Nixon country, and the Republicans would like to cash in on it.

All 13 states gave Nixon their electoral votes in 1968, and the seven states in which he received his highest percentage of the vote are all in this region.

Republicans hold 24 of the 35 House seats as well as the bulk of the governorships and state legislatures.

But six of the region's eight Senate seats up for election this year are held by Democrats, and liberal Democrats at that.

By just winning their share of the close ones, the Republicans could come out with a gain of two or three seats. But two weeks before Election Day, not a single vulnerable seat was being conceded to the GOP and the Democrats saw a chance of picking up one of the two Republican Senate seats.

Furthermore, Democrats have good prospects for gaining House seats in the region, particularly in districts where Republican incumbents are retiring or running for the Senate.

Here's how the House and Senate races looked in the 13 states:

Arizona—Republican Paul J. Fannin, a political twin of his colleague, Barry Goldwater, is in unexpected trouble in his bid for re-election to the Senate.

Democrat Sam Grossman, a 40-year-old Phoenix businessman, has put on a hard-hitting, professional campaign. And the polls show him steadily narrowing Fannin's lead.

In House races, liberal Democrat Morris K. Udall and conservative Republican John J. Rhodes seem assured of re-election. But Democratic challenger Orren Beaty, Jr., is given a chance to upset Rep. Sam Steiger, who has never cast a single COPE "right" vote.

Colorado—Two Democratic and one Republican congressmen are favored to keep their seats. But Republicans see a chance to take over a Democratic seat in a Denver district where incumbent Byron G. Rogers was defeated in the primary. Republican District Atty. James D. McKevitt is running a hard-line "law-and-order" campaign against liberal Democrat Craig S. Barnes.

Idaho—Two Republican incumbent congressmen are favored.

Kansas—A Kansas City district is considered the best possibility for breaking the GOP monopoly of the five House seats. Lt. Gov. James DeCoursey, Jr., is challenging Republican Larry Winn, Jr.

Montana—Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield appears immune to a GOP takeover, and Democrats are favored to hold on to both House seats—including the district captured by John Melcher in a special election last year.

Nebraska—Republican Sen. Roman L. Hruska is a clear favorite over Frank B. Morrison, who has lost two statewide races since his term as governor. In House contests, the vote is expected to be close in two districts where Republican incumbents are not running.

In Omaha, John Hlavacek has a good chance of beating John Y. McCollister, an oil company executive who upset seven-term Rep. Glenn Cunningham in the GOP primary.

A three-way race for the Lincoln area seat vacated by Republican Robert V. Denney finds former Democratic Rep. Clair Callan running as an independent, with a possibility of outpolling the Democratic candidate but a lesser chance of defeating conservative Republican Charles Thone.

Nevada—Republicans came within 84 votes of defeating Sen. Howard W. Cannon in 1964 and Reno District Atty. William Raggio brought in Vice Pres. Agnew to reinforce his attack on the moderate Cannon as an "ultra-liberal." But the attempt to purge Cannon may have backfired and he is favored to win a third term by a somewhat more comfortable margin.

New Mexico—Republican conservatives won their first victory when Anderson Carter defeated moderate Gov. David F. Cargo for the GOP senatorial nomination. Now Carter is trying to pick up the chips by ousting Democrat Joseph M. Montoya, charging that he is a "captive" of unions and doesn't represent the conservative sentiment of the state.

But Montoya has been winning elections in New Mexico virtually all his adult life, and this reservoir of good will could be the deciding factor in overcoming increased conservative influence in the state.

If the conservative tide does not run strong this year, Fabian Chavez, Jr., stands a good chance of taking one of the state's two House seats from Republican Manuel Lujan, Jr.

North Dakota—If anyone doubted that Democratic Sen. Quentin N. Burdick is high on the GOP's target list, Pres. Nixon made it clear by flying into North Dakota for a political rally. His candidate is Rep. Tom Kleppe, a millionaire who brought in high-priced advertising and television experts to prepare a slickly professional "blitz" campaign. Burdick was the early front-runner and soundly defeated Kleppe in the 1964 race. A close race is likely for the House seat Kleppe gave up.

Oklahoma—Eleven-term Rep. Tom Steed is a relatively conservative Democrat, but Republicans are making a major effort to replace him with Jay Wilkinson, son of the former football coach and current White House aide, Bud Wilkinson.

South Dakota—Retirement of both Republican congressmen gives the Democrats a fighting chance to make a pickup.

Utah—Sen. Frank E. Moss, seeking a third term, has been a fighter for consumer interests and a respected liberal voice in the Senate. He is in a close race with Rep. Laurence J. Burton, a conservative Republican with a well-financed campaign.

Burton has attacked Moss for his opposition to "right-to-work" laws banning the union shop and is expected to run strong in the rural areas. Moss is still given a slight edge and Democrats hope for an upset victory to pick up the House seat Burton is relinquishing.

Wyoming—Sen. Gale W. McGee, once on the Republican list of "vulnerable" Democrats, now appears to have taken a firm lead over Rep. John S. Wold. And former Democratic Rep. Teno Roncalio is making a strong bid to win the state's lone House seat in a close race with Harry Roberts.

Meany Spells Out Election Stakes

in the streets' as if those candidates who want to put America back to work are opposed to law and order.

"They are running against 'permissiveness' as if forward-looking candidates — or any responsible American—were in favor of rioting, arson and vandalism."

And, Meany charged, the Nixon Administration and its candidates are substituting "inflammatory rhetoric" for the constructive programs the nation needs.

"America needs better medical care," he said. "America needs millions of homes, it needs day-care centers, clinics, schools, parks and recreational facilities, and the Administration says America can't afford them."

Meany's broadcast was the first of two on the worker's stake in the 1970 elections. The concluding broadcast will be carried on the CBS radio network on Thursday, Oct. 29. It is scheduled for 7:35 p.m., but will be heard at other times in some cities.

Its goal—and the goal of labor's political effort this year—is to help block a conservative takeover in the 92nd Congress that will be elected Nov. 3.

The "phony issue" campaign was mounted by Vice Pres. Agnew with a series of headline-grabbing, wild-swinging assaults on many of the nation's most respected senators.

They are "radical-liberals" in the Vice President's political vocabulary and the conservative businessmen who have crowded into the fund-raising affairs have responded with record contributions for a massive television blitz in the final days of the campaign.

And as the campaign heated up, Pres. Nixon opened an unprecedented 20-state campaign foray, from North Dakota to New Jersey, in an effort to tip the balance in close election contests.

He spoke against busing, for law and order, against obscenity, for Republican candidates who "share my views."

But, at least in the first week of his campaign trip, there were no references to rising unemployment and rising prices—the bread-and-butter issues that normally loom large in off-year congressional campaigns.

Tunney and Murphy in Key Race:

Democrats Look for Gains In Five-State Western Area

By Rex Hardesty

The battle by young California congressman John Tunney to unseat one of the nation's most conservative senators, Republican George Murphy, highlights the 1970 election activity in the nation's five westernmost states—Washington, Oregon, California, Hawaii and Alaska.

A surprise leader in the early polls, the 36-year-old Tunney is now considered to be even with the 68-year-old Murphy. The outcome could hinge on the total vote gathered by Murphy's fellow conservative, incumbent Gov. Ronald Reagan, whom the polls show running ahead of his Democratic challenger Jess Unruh.

Murphy won the seat in 1964 with 51 percent of the vote against Pierre Salinger, while Reagan was elected in 1966 with 57 percent, a margin of more than 900,000 over Pat Brown.

No area of the nation has been harder hit by the recession of 1970 than California, and this has undoubtedly been a factor in Tunney's campaign. Unemployment in the aerospace industry has pushed the state's jobless figures well above the national average of 5.5 percent. The same is true in Washington and to a lesser degree in Oregon.

Republicans hold a 3-1 edge in both the Senate and governors' seats up this year in the five-state region. It would be no surprise if the Democrats take out one incumbent in each category, with Tunney winning in California and William Egan beating incumbent Gov. Keith Miller in Alaska.

Democrats hold an eight-vote margin in House seats in the five states, with a 21-17 edge in California and 5-2 in Washington.

Two of the area's incumbent senators, Democrat Henry M. Jackson in Washington and Republican Hiram L. Fong in Hawaii, are expected to win re-election easily.

Jackson's primary campaign against Negro Carl Maxey, a strong critic of U.S. policies in Viet Nam, attracted considerable attention when Sen. Eugene McCarthy visited the state to campaign against Jackson. But Jackson's 4-1 margin strengthened his hand considerably for the general election campaign against Charles W. Elicker, a 44-year-old state senator who nurtures his resemblance to Theodore Roosevelt with his moustache and hair style.

Fong is opposed by 46-year-old Cecil Heftel, whose family owns a chain of television stations. Fong is the only Republican to hold state-wide office in Hawaii, in which Democrats hold a heavy edge in registration and have dominated the major offices since 1954. But Fong is expected to continue as the exception over the lesser-known Heftel who moved to Hawaii in 1965.

In Alaska, incumbent Sen. Theodore Stevens is attempting to become the first Republican elected to the Senate since statehood. Stevens, who was appointed to the office on the death of E. L. Bartlett in 1969, is opposed by Wendell Kay, a 57-year-old state representative with a militant reputation on conservation issues.

Kay may receive a lift from the gubernatorial candidacy of Egan, Alaska's first statehood governor and one of its best-known figures. Egan is rated an even bet to oust Miller, who inherited the governorship when Walter Hickel was appointed Secretary of the Interior.

Another incumbent GOP governor who may have trouble holding his seat is Tom McCall in Oregon. McCall faces a rematch with Robert Straub, the state treasurer whom McCall defeated by gathering 55 percent of the vote in 1966. But McCall since has approved a state sales tax which was knocked out by a subsequent referendum.

The West's lone Democratic incumbent governor, John A. Burns of Hawaii, had to survive a divisive primary against the lieutenant governor, Thomas P. Gill. Burns won 56 percent of the vote in defeating Gill and now faces Republican Sam King, a former judge and son of a territorial governor.

Just as California offers a clear choice in the Tunney vs. Murphy election, its congressional contests span the entire political spectrum.

Two members of the John Birch Society, John H. Rousselot and John G. Schmitz, were elected to fill vacancies this summer. And Rousselot is opposed again this fall by Myrlie Evers, the 37-year-old widow of slain Mississippi NAACP leader Medgar Evers.

The California congressional spectrum also offers such contrasts as GOP Rep. Bob Wilson, who is charged with 81 "wrong" votes on the COPE record, and Democratic Rep. John Moss, whose lifetime COPE record is 90 right and 2 wrong.

Right-wing Republicans are making a run at two liberal Democratic incumbents in Washington. Rep. Julia Butler Hansen is opposed by R. C. McConkey and Rep. Thomas S. Foley by George Gamble. Both have John Birch Society ties, but McConkey has denied he is a member and Gamble resigned recently as an area coordinator for the Birch Society.

In Oregon, two Democratic and one Republican incumbents appear headed for re-election. A closer race is faced by Rep. John Dellenback, who is challenged by Democrat James Weaver.

Alaska's lone House member, Howard Pollock, gave up his seat for an unsuccessful run against Miller for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Democrats see a good chance to pick up the seat.

In Hawaii, neither of the two incumbent Democrats, Patsy Mink and Spark Matsunaga, had primary opposition and Mrs. Mink has no GOP opponent. Matsunaga is opposed by Navy officer Richard Mockey.

New England Spotlight On Two Senate Races

By John M. Barry

Close and colorful contests for the U.S. Senate in Connecticut and Vermont dominate the New England political landscape this fall as both major parties hope to capitalize on the chance to pick up a seat.

For the Republicans, Connecticut is a major target, and Pres. Nixon has already made one stop there in his campaign swing to boost the fortunes of GOP candidates. Currently, the polls give the edge to Rep. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., over the Democratic candidate, the Rev. Joseph D. Duffey, and the incumbent, Sen. Thomas J. Dodd, who is running as an independent after declining to seek the Democratic nomination.

Dodd, who was censured by his Senate colleagues over the personal use of campaign contributions, is given little chance of retaining the seat. But it is unclear at this point which of his two opponents will suffer from his candidacy.

With an unusually large percentage of the voters still listed by the polls as undecided, the result could well hinge on the size of the vote the Democrats are able to turn out for Duffey.

Two other Connecticut congressmen, Democrat Emilio Q. Daddario and Republican Thomas J. Meskill, are contesting for the governorship with the later generally given a narrow lead at this point. National economic issues weigh heavily in the race, however, and Daddario is pounding on the state's 6.6 percent unemployment rate.

On the congressional scene, where the Democrats now hold a 4-to-2 edge, local observers give the GOP a chance for a net gain of at least one depending on the size and direction of the vote for governor.

Nixon's choice of Vermont for another of his campaign stops was a clear indication that the Republicans see a serious threat to Sen. Winston L. Prouty in the challenge of former Gov. Philip H. Hoff.

The 46-year-old Hoff built a strong following as the first Democratic governor in 106 years and has succeeded in making Prouty's Senate attendance record and the infrequency of his visits to Vermont a major campaign issue. If he is able to overcome defections by conservatives in his own party to win election, Hoff would be the first Democrat in history to represent Vermont in the Senate.

The coat-tail effect and a Republican split lingering from a bitter primary battle give the Democratic candidate for governor, State Sen. Leo O'Brien, Jr., an opportunity to unseat Gov. Deane C. Davis.

Elsewhere in the six-state New England area, there is little likelihood of a dramatic shift in the political spectrum.

Maine—Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, the Democratic vice presidential candidate in 1968, is expected to win re-election easily over Neil S. Bishop, a high school teacher and former state legislator.

Muskie's popularity could spill over enough to return Democrat Kenneth M. Curtis to the governorship despite a strong challenge from State Atty. Gen. James S. Erwin and the unpopularity of a new income tax law.

The two Democratic congressmen, Peter N. Kyros and William D. Hathaway, appear to face little trouble in winning re-election.

Massachusetts—To most observers, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's bid for a second term leaves only the size of the vote in question. Nevertheless, Kennedy is campaigning vigorously and his efforts should aid the rest of the Democratic ticket.

The race for governor ground to a halt when the Democrat, Boston Mayor Kevin H. White was hospitalized for surgery on an ulcer and Gov. Francis W. Sargent suspended his own campaigning pending White's recovery. The contest is close, and White could score an upset with strong support from the opponents he defeated in the primary, State Sen. Pres. Maurice A. Donahue and former Lt. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti.

Democrats now hold eight of the state's 12 House seats and hope to add a ninth in the 12th District where incumbent Republican Hastings Keith is in a close race with 33-year-old Gerry E. Studds, a former teacher.

New Hampshire — Republicans are heavily favored to retain the governorship and the state's two House seats. Gov. Walter B. Peterson is opposed by two conservatives, Democrat Roger J. Crowley, Jr., and Meldrim Thomson, Jr., running as the American Party candidate after losing narrowly to Peterson in the GOP primary.

Rhode Island — All Democratic incumbents in this heavily Democratic state are expected to win re-election—Sen. John O. Pastore, Gov. Frank Licht and Representatives Fernand St. Germain and Robert O. Tiernan. The only close contest is for the governorship, where State Atty. Gen. Herbert F. DiSimone has divorced himself from the rest of the GOP slate.

N.Y. Labor Adopts Plan To Treat Drug Addicts

New York—A two-pronged attack on drug addiction is being developed by the New York City Central Labor Council. The program was drafted by 95 union representatives at a seminar on drug addiction sponsored by the city AFL-CIO.

The plan calls for:

- Community referral centers that will be set up in union offices across the city.
- Coverage of drug addiction in health insurance benefits to be negotiated in future union contracts.

Chairman Michael Sampson of the council's Community Services Committee said proposals for the operation of the referral centers are now being drafted. State funds were promised for the centers by Milton Luger, chairman of the New York State Narcotics Addiction Control Commission.

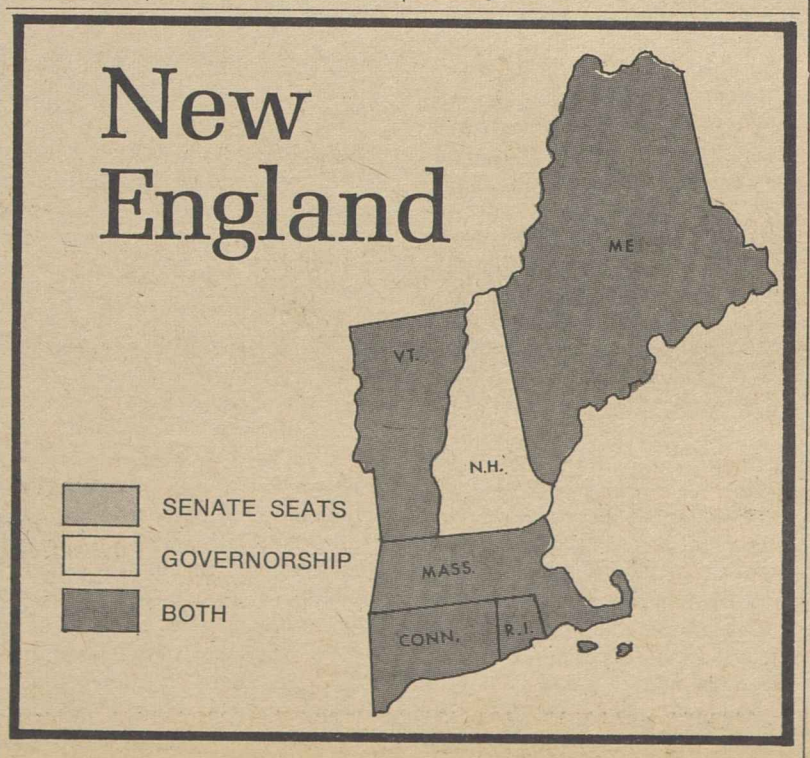
The initial plan calls for five centers, one in each of the city's boroughs, Sampson said. Eventually, several centers would be set-up in each borough.



The need for referral centers was recognized as the number of inquiries on drug problems has mounted at the council's Community Services rehabilitation office. Sampson said that requests for assistance on drug addiction have grown from a few a month two years ago to 20 or 30 a week currently.

In the past two years, the council's rehabilitation office has referred 350 addicts to state and city-operated rehabilitation centers, he reported.

Headquarters of the new referral centers would be in the council's rehabilitation office. The centers will be staffed by professional social service workers experienced in handling narcotics problems.

Sampson noted that health and welfare insurance provided under current union contracts does not specifically cover treatment of drug addiction.

He said, however, that union negotiators representing the city AFL-CIO's more than 1 million members will seek assurance of such protection in future contracts.

'Pro-Worker' Pose:

Safety Bill Tactics Belie Kind Words

force safety rules. We take the position that he should. The position the Secretary of Labor takes is that he doesn't want that power —that he wants it shunted into some kind of board—in effect a labor court—that would be making decisions.

"It has been our experience over the years that unless you centralize the responsibility for enforcement of a law, you don't get very good enforcement."

Looking at the record of Congress to date, Biemiller said labor's program has "done rather well" in certain areas.

He cited the overriding of presidential vetoes of aid to education funds and appropriations for hospital construction and health facilities. The recently-passed mass transit bill was another plus, Biemiller said. But in unemployment compensation, "we only got part of what we were after. . . . We were blocked in trying to extend coverage to farm workers."

The Nov. 3 congressional elections will be important, Biemiller noted, because "if we make some small gains, I think we'll get more action out of the next Congress." Labor will be pressing hard to pass a national health insurance bill, he stressed.

And if conservatives emerge stronger, there will be the danger of a "value-added tax," which Biemiller termed a fancy name for a federal sales tax imposed at every level of production, boosting the price to consumers up to 20 percent.

The two interviewers—Neil MacNeil, chief congressional correspondent for Time Magazine, and Kenneth Crawford, contributing editor of Newsweek Magazine —sought labor's evaluation of the Administration's campaign strategy this year.

Vice Pres. Agnew, Biemiller suggested, is using "the oldest trick in American politics—make the most outlandish statements you can in the hope of getting attention."

Early in the nation's history, he noted, "John Quincy Adams was once accused of being a procurer of American virgins for the Czar of Russia."

And "while Agnew gets a lot of attention, I doubt that it's having very much effect upon the electorate."

More significant, Biemiller said, is the unlimited spending on television time in political campaigns and labor will "do everything we can" to urge Congress to override the President's veto of a bill setting limits on campaign spending for radio and television.

Biemiller said, the AFL-CIO is "perfectly willing to work with this Administration" for programs to benefit the nation. But its economic and social policies are clearly opposed to labor's programs and the worker's purchasing power is now "lower than it was when this Administration took power."

The interview took place on the Labor News Conference program, heard Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

ADMINISTRATION EFFORTS to block a strong job safety and health bill is no way to win friends and political influence among America's workers, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said. He was questioned by Neil MacNeil of Time Magazine, left, and Kenneth Crawford of Newsweek, right, on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Labor Backs USO Appeal On Yule Gifts

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services has appealed to all union members to join in the USO drive to donate Christmas gift items to American servicemen and women overseas.

Leo Perlis, director of the department, who is a member of the USO board of directors and national council, urged union members and their families to "share" their holiday season and "help to ease the loneliness of our service personnel, many of whom will be away from home for the first time."

Perlis said gifts and contributions should be directed to all USO facilities, with emphasis on clubs in Viet Nam, Thailand and Korea. Addresses of USO clubs and lists of favorite gift items may be obtained from any USO facility or from the USO National Council, 237 East 52nd St., New York, N.Y. 10022.

The Christmas deadline mailing dates are as follows: surface mail weighing more than 5 pounds, Nov. 6; Space Available Mail less than 5 pounds, including greeting cards, Nov. 20; Parcel Airlift Mail, Nov. 27; and regular airmail of all weights, Dec. 11.

Suggested gift items include small flashlights, terrycloth towels, notebooks, inflatable pillows, packaged cocoa or fruit drinks, playing cards and other games, paperback books and blank recording tapes. Servicewomen included on their "most wanted" list all types of hair-setting preparations and equipment, as well as fashion magazines and cosmetics.

OUTRAGEOUS DEFIANCE of federal and state laws that set standards on the operation of nursing homes must be stopped, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, left, declares in a forum on care for the elderly. Listening to his comments are Rep. David H. Pryor, (D-Ark.), center, who conducted the hearing, and Executive Dir. William Hutton of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Failure to Enforce U.S. Standards Blamed for Nursing Home Abuses

came from the public in the form of tax dollars.

Yet, he observed, a staff of just three persons in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare supervises enforcement of federal regulations in thousands of nursing homes receiving Medicaid funds.

Although Congress amended the Social Security Act three years ago to require that HEW assure a proper return for federal funds under the Medicaid program, Seidman said the department is only now beginning to implement the action.

"The AFL-CIO strongly opposes the use of federal funds to finance unregulated nursing home care that falls far below the standards stipulated in federal laws and regulations," he told the forum.

The standards are not impossible to meet, Seidman said as he commended the operators of both non-profit and proprietary nursing homes that "offer good accomodations, a healthful environment and first-class medical and nursing care."

"Unfortunately, there are far too many nursing homes which do not begin to meet these standards," he reminded observers in the packed hearing room.

He listed fire hazards, improper foods, lack of medicines or improperly administered medicines, and poor nursing care among the abuses.

Pryor, who is pressing for the House to create a select committee to investigate the nursing home industry, noted that only 10 percent of these facilities are operated on a non-profit basis.

"Those who are entering the nursing-home-for-profit business," he declared in a prepared statement, "are generally builders, contractors, restaurant operators, fast buck entrepreneurs."

"The price per bed in these homes is zooming upward at an alarming rate—$700 a month is not uncommon," Pryor said, and additional charges are piled on these rates.

Two officials of the National Council of Senior Citizens—Pres. Nelson Cruikshank and Executive Dir. William Hutton also expressed concern over the excessive costs of care for the elderly while citing the "shocking neglect" of the patients.

Cruikshank, former AFL-CIO social security director, questioned the reasoning of many states that have nursing home operators and administrators on the regulatory boards that license and oversee the operations of nursing homes in their own states.

A number of other witnesses told of widespread abuses in nursing homes throughout the country:

● Mrs. Gary Weibye of Houston, Tex., said that her grandmother had been a patient in a nursing home where "sanitary conditions sent my stomach into spasms." The premises "always reeked of urine," and the food was usually served cold on dirty dishes, she added.

● At Robbindale, Minn., Mrs. Glenn Thethewey said she visited a patient dying of cancer and found her in a urine-soaked bed with dried vomit on her gown and pillow.

● Max Serchuk told of a patient in Miami who had food brought in from outside because he could not get a decent meal at the nursing home.

Joe Hamm, a former administrator of a nursing home in Detroit, told the forum that he had been "blacklisted" by the nursing home industry after he informed the governor of Michigan about appalling conditions.

Hamm, who is now serving with the Oakland County Commission on Economic Opportunity in Michigan, said that the profit motive is the prime objective at many nursing homes, rather than the care of patients.

Hamm said that nursing home operators were usually informed before state inspectors arrived so as to give them time to spruce up the facilities.

Hutton noted that the patients also know when there is an inspection coming. "That is when they get a decent meal and the place gets cleaned up," he said.

Congress Lifts Barriers To Group Health Plans

Congress gave a strong boost to prepaid group health programs when it passed a new Health Services Improvement Act shortly before adjournment.

One section of the legislation would have the effect of lifting restrictions on group medical practice imposed in a number of communities, usually stemming from opposition by conservative medical associations.

It would do this by permitting insurance carriers and other participants in the health benefits program for federal employes to set up prepaid plans that would be open to all persons in a community.

A Senate committee report on this section of the bill said that "prepaid group practice has become one of the most promising developments for improving the delivery of high quality medical care in the United States."

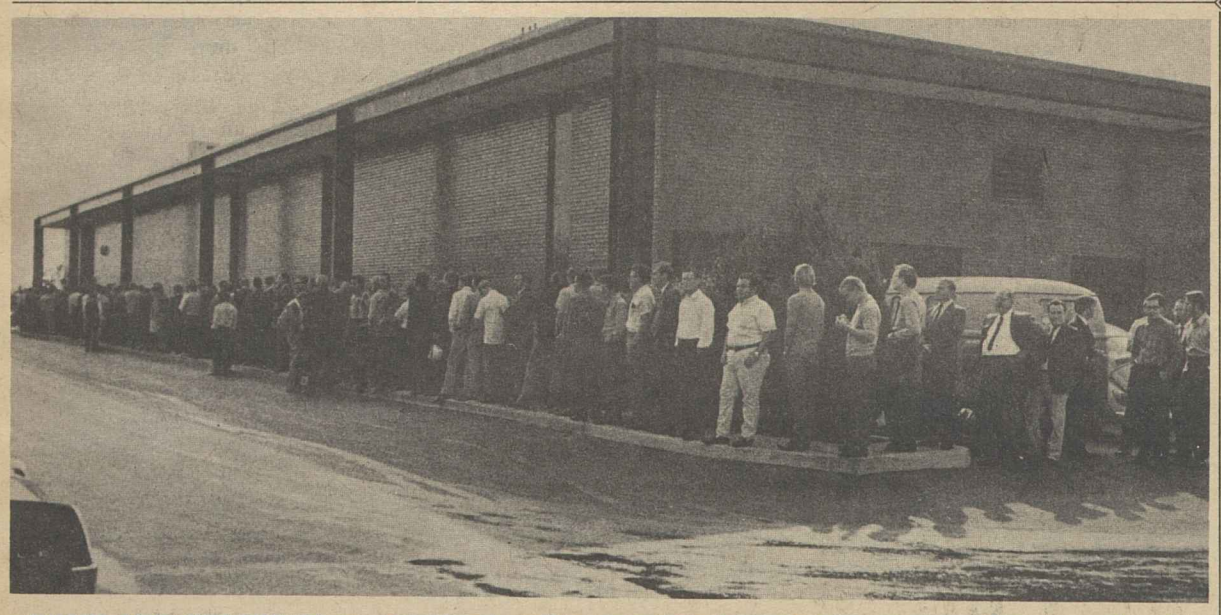
Nevertheless, the committee noted, "in about 20 states today, prepaid group practice is inhibited by substantial obstacles, created by local laws and regulations."



The new legislation, the committee said, "would facilitate the group practice of medicine. It provides that the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare may authorize carriers participating in federal health benefit programs for federal employes to issue contracts for prepaid group practice health services to any persons, whether or not such persons are federal employes."

It cited an innovative program in Columbia, Md., where Johns Hopkins University Medical School and the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co. have formed a prepaid group practice plan.

Labor Spurs Record Vote To Counter 'Fear, Smear'

FOUR JOB OPENINGS at a California utility company brought this response from people who are desperate for work in a state where the jobless rate is at the 7 percent level. More than 700 applicants queued up for job interviews when the San Fernando Valley office of the Southern California Gas Co. advertised for four meter readers.

Meany Emphasizes Stake of Workers

By John M. Barry

A record Election Day turnout of union voters "who understand the basic economic issues at stake" was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "to defeat the campaign of fear and smear directed against labor's friends."

Meany made the appeal in a telegram to all affiliated unions, state federations and big-city central bodies as the American people prepared to go to the polls Nov. 3.

The immediate stakes in the election are the shape of the new Congress, 35 governorships and control of 45 state legislatures.

The broader stakes encompass organized labor's program to revitalize the economy, achieve full employment and seek solutions to pressing national problems in such areas as health, pollution, civil rights and poverty.

As the campaign approached its climax, Meany termed labor's get-out-the-vote drive "crucial." His telegram urged unions and their members "to spare no effort to establish a record vote on Tuesday—a vote for candidates opposed to high unemployment, high prices, high interest rates and high medical costs. One day's hard work can mean two years of substantial progress."

Labor's emphasis on the declining national economy as the overriding campaign issue was given added weight in the week before the election as the government released reports confirming the spread of joblessness and the continuing business slump.

The Labor Dept. announced that in October five more major job centers, including Los Angeles, entered the category of "substantial" unemployment—6 percent or more jobless—along with 13 smaller areas. That brings the total of big manpower areas on the "substantial" list to 38, against only five a year ago. (Story, this page.)

And the Commerce Dept. reported that its composite index of leading economic indicators dropped still further in September to reach the lowest point so far this year.

Earlier, in an interview with reporters from the major wire services, Meany accused the Nixon Administration of using "calculated deception" and "Madison Avenue doubletalk" in its attempt to picture the economy as improving.

"There has not been improvement and there is no indication that there is going to be improvement," Meany declared. (Story, this page.)

He described as "plain old election bunk" efforts of such Administration spokesmen as Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew to obscure the

AFL-CIO Ties Health Plan To Election

The campaign for national health insurance moves into the voting booth Nov. 3, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told America's workers.

His nationwide radio broadcast —the second of two on the campaign issues—stressed the importance of electing COPE-endorsed congressmen and senators "who care about workers and consumers, who will move this nation forward." (Text, Page 5.)

Except for unemployment, Meany said, "there is no fear that haunts the average American worker more than the fear of sickness, and the crushing medical bills and hospital bills that go with it."

Before the new Congress, he said, will be labor-supported legislation

Meany Hits 'Deception':

Administration Line On Economy Scored

By Jane Van Sant

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged the Nixon Administration with "calculated deception, Madison Avenue doubletalk" in its pre-election statements on the shape of the national economy. "At least they should tell it like it is," he insisted.

Meany, interviewed by reporters from the major wire services, said that despite all the Administration's optimistic observations, the government's own statistics clearly show what has happened to the economy during the 20 months since Pres. Nixon took office.

- The Consumer Price Index is up 10 percent.
- Unemployment is up 72 percent to 4.6 million with 2 million more persons seeking jobs without success.
- The effective interest rate on FHA home mortgages is up 21 percent from 7.5 percent to 9.07 percent.
- Housing starts are down 21 percent.
- The number of major industrial areas with substantial unemployment is up from six in January 1969 to 35 in September 1970. (The number subsequently rose to 38 in October.)

This actual record of the failure of the Administration's economic "game plan" is the chief issue of the campaign, Meany declared.

"There has not been improvement and there is no indication that there is going to be improvement."

In fact, he said, there are indications that the Administration is holding back further cutbacks and that the situation could become worse.

Meany assessed the mood among most union members as apprehensive. They don't see any signs that the recession has "bottomed out," he observed, or that we are at the "threshhold of recovery" that Administration spokesmen refer to in their statements on the economy.

He charged that Administration spokesmen are emphasizing crime and youth revolt in their campaign appearances in an effort to avoid the "gut issues" posed by inflation and the sagging econ-

Stone Workers Approve Merger with Steel Union

St. Louis—The Stone Workers convention approved a merger with the Steelworkers aimed at strengthening both unions, eliminating overlapping jurisdiction and paving the way for new organizing drives.

The 20,000-member Stone Workers, founded in 1903, will join with the 1.2 million-member Steelworkers on Jan. 1.

Stone Workers Pres. Gaston LeBlanc said delegates approved the merger plan by a 240-30 vote. The Steelworkers had ratified the agreement at their recent convention.

Under the merger agreement, the officers and staff of the Stone Workers will become part of the Steelworkers' staff, the union's locals will become Steelworkers' locals, and the Barre, Vt., headquarters of the union will be retained as a field office.

In its earliest years, the union was known as the Quarry Workers and was made up of granite workers in New England. Its membership is now spread widely across the United States and Canada, includ-

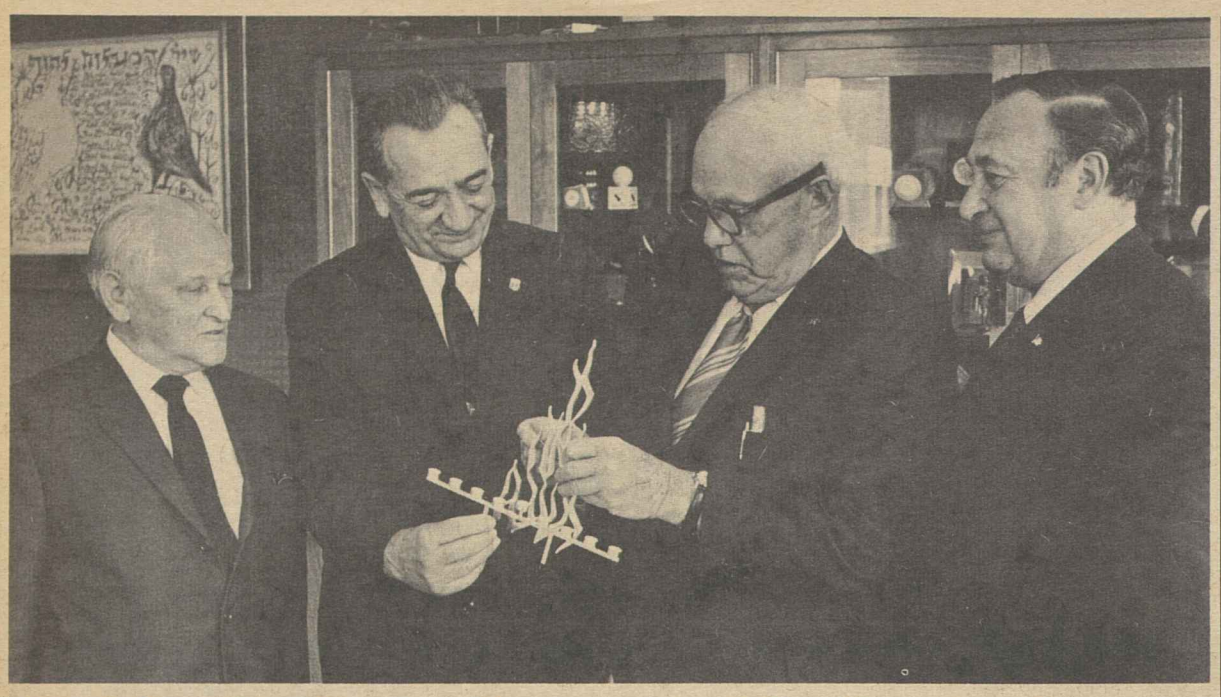
Jobless Rate Above 6% In 38 Manpower Areas

Spreading unemployment in October pushed the number of major manpower centers with a jobless rate of 6 percent or more to 38. This includes five new areas that were added since September to the Labor Dept.'s "substantial" unemployment list.

The department's report for October showed that more than one-fourth of the nation's 150 major job centers are now classified as having "substantial" joblessness. One year ago, there were only five such areas.



The Labor Dept. also added 13 smaller labor areas to the substantial unemployment list, raising that number to 588.

Among the new major areas in that category are the California manpower centers of Los Angeles-Long Beach, San Diego, and San Bernardino-Riverside-Ontario. Others are Lawrence-Haverhill, Mass., and New Brunswick-Perth Amboy, N.J.

Two major employment centers were taken off the "substantial" list during the month and reclassified as having "moderate" unemployment—from 3 percent to 5.9 percent. They are Utica-Rome, N.Y., and Kenosha, Wis.

The 13 smaller areas where joblessness rose over the month to the "substantial" level are: Cocoa, Fla.; Camilla, Homerville, and Lakeland,

TOP ATHLETES from 20 nations will participate in Israel's Hapoel Games, the world tournament held every five years by the sports arm of the labor federation, Histadrut. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany accepts the honorary chairmanship of the U.S. committee, and is presented a symbolic menorah by Haim Glovinsky of the Olympic Committee of Israel. At left is Israel Stolarsky, treasurer of the committee. At right is Martin L. Cohen, chairman of the U.S. committee for the Hapoel Games and manager of Local 105 of the Ladies' Garment Workers. The games will be held April 26-May 5, 1971, during the celebration of the 23rd anniversary of Israel's independence. It will also help mark the 50th anniversary of Histadrut and the 45th anniversary of the Hapoel Games.

$2.8 Million Due Workers:

Wage Cheating Up In Federal Contracts

A sharp increase in wage underpayments by federal government contractors has been uncovered by compliance officers from the Labor Dept.'s wage and hour division.

Nearly 23,000 employes were cheated, deliberately or otherwise, of $2.8 million in wages due them under the Davis-Bacon Act and the Contract Work-Hours Safety Standards Act in fiscal 1970, Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran reported.

The two laws deal primarily with construction wage minimums on work performed under federal and federally-assisted contracts.

Moran said the latest findings show an increase of 152 percent over 1969 in the number of employes underpaid, and 176 percent in the amount of wages due but not paid.

One result of the findings is that 18 companies were debarred for failure to pay the minimum wages required by law. They will not be eligible to bid on any further government contracts for three years, Moran said.

He attributed the rise in violations uncovered to a drive on contract areas involving federally-assisted construction jobs. More than two-thirds of the underpayments exposed involve federally-assisted contracts, he said.

Moran's announcement did not disclose the amount of money recovered for the victims of wage underpayments—a duty that rests with the legal division. The AFL-CIO experience has been that not much more than a third of such losses ever are recovered, due in part to the failure of many of the underpaid workers to press their claims.

In a related field, Moran pledged "vigorous, immediate" investigation of a "mounting number of reports" of violations of the Equal Pay and Age Discrimination Act and the wage garnishment law.

He discussed the reports with the Labor Dept.'s eight recently-named regional administrators for the Workplace Standards Administration, who met for the first time in Washington, D.C. That was followed by a two-day conference of wage-hour regional directors at San Clemente, Calif.

The wage-hour division has direct enforcement responsibility for violations of the Equal Pay Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Wage Garnishment law, the Fair Labor Standards Act and similar laws affecting the jobs and wages of 50 million U.S. workers.

Moran said the volume of incoming complaints "points up the challenges and obligations" of the new workplace administration on behalf of wage earners. He advised field workers that investigative priority be given to cases involving low-wage earners. He said "these are the people who need our help the most."

In the field of age discrimination, Moran cited instances of workers in their 50s and 60s "losing their jobs within a year or two of retirement eligibility for company-financed pension plans."

"Some complain their jobs are later filled by younger people at lower wage rates," he said. Many are heads of families and the loss of a job, or denial of employment opportunity, "generally results in great family hardship," he observed.

Citizens Group to Aid Families of GM Strikers

Detroit—A nationwide Citizens' Committee to Aid the Families of General Motors Strikers has been formed "to prevent hunger from having any bearing on the outcome" of the strike.

The committee is headed by former Sen. Paul Douglas. Its members include AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Dir. Cesar Chavez of the Farm Workers, Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Senators Birch Bayh, Philip A. Hart, Edward M. Kennedy and George S. McGovern.

The committee "will not take sides on the merits" of the Auto Workers' strike against GM, Douglas said in a message read at a special UAW convention. The 3,100 delegates to the session voted to raise dues of UAW members not on strike to help meet the union's expenses.

In Washington, Meany declared that "victory for the UAW strikers is vital to all American workers. We in the AFL-CIO are going to do all we can to help them."

The committee is similar to one established in the UAW strike against GM in 1946, when a broadly representative group including some Republican officials conducted a nationwide drive for aid to strikers. No Republicans are listed on the 1970 committee.

Douglas said committee members have joined "because we believe it is essential to settle the strike on the merits and not on the basis of brute economic force." With the message was a personal donation of $100 from the 80-year-old former senator, signaling the start of a nationwide drive "to prevent hunger from having any bearing on the outcome" of the strike.

The UAW had $120 million in its defense fund when the GM strike started. As of Oct. 23, the union said, the balance was $72.8 million, and that would be exhausted by late November. The union is paying nearly $20 million a week in strike benefits at the rate of $30 to $40 a week and covering insurance premiums.

The demands of the strike are such, UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock told the convention, "that we cannot possibly raise enough additional money to provide weekly benefits" on the present basis.

It is "absolutely imperative," he said, "that we continue hospital-medical-surgical-drug insurance and life insurance" payments while the strike lasts. In GM that costs $23 million a month, and the UAW head noted, "we have become obligated for that sum" in October. In November, "we will be obligated for another $23 million," he said.

Convention delegates approved a dues increase formula applied as follows: 350,000 workers at Ford, Chrysler, American Motors and some supplier and farm-implement plants who will get cost-of-living raises of 26 cents an hour retroactive to Sept. 14 will pay $20 a month, plus two extra hours of pay per month; the other 550,000 UAW members will pay double dues—four hours' pay a month instead of the present two hours.

Delegates Spur Big Delaware Vote Turnout

Rehoboth, Del.—An all-out drive for a big Election Day turnout of union members was a main order of business at the 14th annual Delaware State AFL-CIO convention.

The 200 delegates voted a strong endorsement to the Democratic candidates for statewide office—Jacob Zimmerman in the Senate race and John Daniello in the contest for the state's single House seat.

The convention called on the post-election session of Congress to pass the labor-supported occupational safety and health bill, which would put responsibility for enforcement of federal standards in the Secretary of Labor.

A report on state legislation noted partial success this year in raising the state minimum wage to match the $1.60 federal level, improving unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation, barring dismissal of employes whose wages are garnisheed, and enacting pay increases for various groups of public employes.

Charles H. Kerrigan, UAW Official, Dies

New York—Charles H. Kerrigan, who in September was named a special assistant to Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, died here of a heart attack at the age of 57.

Kerrigan was the UAW's eastern regional director for 29 years.

'70 Contracts Show Bigger Wage Hikes

Major union contract settlements in the first nine months of 1970 produced an average annual wage increase of 9.6 percent, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said key settlements so far this year have occurred in the rubber, meat packing, electrical equipment, apparel manufacture, trucking and construction industries. The annual pay rise averaged 2 percent above raises negotiated in the same period of 1969 for workers in private non-farm industries.

The average first-year increase in the 1970 settlements was 13.2 percent of straight-time hourly pay, up from 9 percent in the corresponding period of last year.

The BLS said that for major settlements covering 5,000 or more workers, the total wage-benefit package averaged 14.7 percent in the first contract year.

The number of workers involved in major agreements so far this year is 2.6 million, including 1 million in manufacturing and nearly 1.6 million in nonmanufacturing categories. That figure could rise to 5 million, double the year-ago figure, if settlements are reached in the auto and railroad industries.

The report showed also that:

- In manufacturing alone, the annual rate of increase in the new settlements averaged 6.4 percent. The average first-year wage increase, however, was 8.5 percent, up from 7.7 percent in a year's time.
- In nonmanufacturing alone, the annual wage-rate increase averaged 11.6 percent. The first-year average gain was 16 percent against 10.4 percent for January through September 1969.
- In construction contracts, increases over the life of the contract averaged 15.1 percent, with wages and fringe benefits showing a first-year rise of 19.2 percent.

Maximilion Hunzeker Of AFL-CIO Staff Dies

Dundee, Fla.—Maximilion Hunzeker, field representative for the AFL-CIO and the former AFL in Florida for 18 years, died unexpectedly at his home here. He was 55.

Before joining the federation staff, Hunzeker served as president of the Citrus Workers in Winter Haven, Fla., and as vice president of the Florida Council of Citrus Workers Unions.

Economist, Educator Ben Seligman Dies

Amherst, Mass.—Ben B. Seligman, economist and labor educator who directed the University of Massachusetts Labor Center, died at his home here. He was 57.

Seligman had been a faculty member at Massachusetts since 1965, when he took over direction of the university's labor extension service and labor studies program. Before that he had been an economics teacher in New York City high schools, managing editor of the magazine Labor and Nation, director of the Washington office of the American Jewish Committee and, from 1957 to 1965, director of research for the Retail Clerks.

Cement Workers Elect Miechur New President

San Diego—Delegates to the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers convention here concluded their week-long sessions by electing Thomas F. Miechur as their new president along with three new vice presidents.

Miechur, who is administrative assistant to Pres. Felix C. Jones, will succeed Jones on the latter's retirement Dec. 31. Miechur defeated Richard A. Northrip of Birmingham, Ala., executive secretary-treasurer of the union's District 5.

Elected without opposition to succeed retiring vice presidents were Earl Benjamin of Saugerties, N.Y., V. W. Thompson of Birmingham, Ala., and Henry Bechtholdt of Seattle, Wash.

Sec.-Treas. Reuben Roe and five incumbent vice presidents were re-elected without opposition.

The convention voted a 34-cent increase in per capita payments and improved the pension and health and welfare plans covering the union's officers, field staff and employes.

The convention turned down a resolution that would have imposed compulsory retirement of all officers, staff and employes at age 65.

Delegates approved a two-step salary increase for all officers and staff members—10 percent effective Nov. 1 and another 10 percent a year later. They chose Las Vegas, Nev., as the 1972 convention site.

During the week, the delegates heard addresses by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Frank McCallister, Labor Educator, Dies

Chicago — Memorial services were held at the University of Chicago Oct. 27 for Frank McCallister, director of Roosevelt University's labor education division since 1949 and a pioneer labor educator. He died at 62 of an unexpected heart attack.

A member of the Teachers and the Textile Workers Union of America, McCallister was from 1946 to 1949 director of the Georgia Workers Education Service, a joint AFL and CIO project for workers' education.

Kirkland at Safety Conference:

On-the-Job Accident Toll Termed 'National Disaster'

By John R. Oravec

Chicago—The toll of on-the-job deaths and injuries is a national disaster that is repeated every year, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council.

Yet, he observed, "no disaster in history has received so little attention as the one that blights the lives of millions of families of American workers."

There is little doubt, Kirkland said, that if the people "truly understood the price paid in human lives and suffering" in the workplace, they would demand quick and decisive action.

He called for immediate efforts to put greater emphasis on the saving of lives through the prevention of on-the-job accidents and occupational illnesses. And he predicted that delaying tactics of conservatives and special interest groups to head off a strong occupational health and safety bill in Congress "will not work."

"The scandal has grown too great, the demand too imperative for them to succeed much longer in blocking all action," Kirkland stressed. "They are concentrating on trying to make sure that when regulation does come, it will be weak, dilatory, complicated, hard to administer, and—as nearly as possible—impossible to enforce.

"Their tactics were so mean and their motives so transparent that I hope and believe it was the last victory the American people will allow them.

"I have every confidence," he declared, "that the Occupational Health & Safety bill of 1970 is going to become law before the 91st Congress passes into history."

The thrust of the bill is to vest the responsibility for establishing and enforcing federal job safety standards in the Secretary of Labor, he pointed out.

The jumble of regulations currently in effect favors the profit motive of employers more than the lives and well-being of their employes, Kirkland charged.

He also cited irregularities in the reporting of injuries and deaths from on-the-job accidents and diseases. "Serious efforts must be made to uncover the facts" he said in questioning the accuracy of the statistics and alluding to a study by Jerome Gordon that investigated the "Undercounting of Job Casualties."

There is disagreement whether more than 25 million on-the-job accidents a year deserve to be labeled as "serious," Kirkland noted, "but nobody seems to dispute the fact that those accidents do happen and that most of them are swept under the rug."

Job safety statisticians generally recognize that at least 14,500 workers are killed and 2 million injured seriously on the job every year.

Passage of effective job safety legislation is one of the key goals the AFL-CIO is currently pursuing in Congress. The measures were introduced in the House by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and in the Senate by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.).

Both measures would give authority on job safety matters to the Labor Dept. Substitute bills backed by the Nixon Administration would delegate the authority to a number of other agencies and panels.

Kirkland said it is unfortunate that Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson is attempting to shun the responsibility for enforcement of an effective safety law.

Every worker has the right to full and effective protection from danger on the job, he declared. This kind of protection, he stressed, "implies a single national policy, a single national set of standards, a single administrative authority and a single, uniform enforcement procedure."

At the annual meeting of the NSC, Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers was re-elected a vice president representing the Labor Conference.

Thomas A. Dillon of Machinists District 55 succeeded Alan F. Burch of the Operating Engineers as chairman of the Labor Conference. Edward J. Legan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was elected vice chairman. Charles T. Greene of the District of Columbia Industrial Safety Division, was appointed to an unexpired term representing labor on the NSC board of directors. He succeeds the late Victor E. Whitehouse of the IBEW.

The Labor Conference established a memorial award honoring Whitehouse, who had served on the conference for 10 years. The plaque was presented to the IBEW.

Additional awards were presented to Auto Workers Local 838, Waterloo, Iowa; Papermakers & Paperworkers Local 189, Bogalusa, La.; William E. O'Brien, safety engineer of Papermakers Local 189; IBEW Local 58, Detroit; Steelworkers Local 6500, Sudbury, Ont.; Machinists Lodge 851, Joliet, Ill.; Steelworkers Local 1005, Hamilton, Ont., and Joseph Leonard, safety director of the Longshoremen.

AWARD PLAQUE of the Maritime Trades Dept.'s Greater New York Port Council is presented to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland for his "outstanding contribution to the maritime industry in 1970." Presenting the plaque is Anthony Scotto, president of the port council and vice president of the Longshoremen.

Meany Keys Progress To Nonviolent Change

Dubuque, Iowa—The labor movement is committed to preserving American institutions while working to improve the system for the benefit of all, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared as he accepted the John F. Kennedy Award at Loras College.

"We in the AFL-CIO are going to continue to work for a better America and . . . a better world without abandoning the basic principles of human decency and justice under which this nation was founded," he stressed.

Meany is the seventh recipient of the award that was established by the college in 1963 and presented annually "to an outstanding American who walks in the footsteps of John Fitzgerald Kennedy."

Previous recipients include R. Sargent Shriver, Richard Cardinal Cushing and Judge Otto Kerner of Chicago.

"American labor has a stake in preserving our American institutions," Meany said, "and we intend to do what we can to prevent their destruction under any false label of progress."

People of the labor movement "are old timers in this business of dissent," he asserted, but "we do not believe . . . that the right to dissent is a license to burn and loot or destroy."

"And when we are dissatisfied with conditions as they are," he observed, "that dissatisfaction motivates us to advocate a change for the better," Meany continued.

"I have no illusions. I don't see perfection in the labor movement. I don't see perfection in this country as a whole. But speaking as one individual American, I can say that under this system we have here in the United States—with all the mistakes we make—that in my lifetime I have seen greater and greater progress . . . than has happened anywhere else in recorded human history."

He stressed that the labor movement is interested in matters that affect all workers—not just union members—and noted that unions have pioneered in fighting for a wide range of benefits: workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, minimum wage laws, social security and pensions, consumer legislation and Medicare.

"We have played a major role in the enactment of these laws and many others that have contributed to the quality of American life," Meany stressed.

Labor, he said, is now pressing for a national health insurance program in an effort to solve the country's medical care crisis.

"Organized labor is convinced that our old system for the delivery of medical care must be replaced by a national health plan that will provide the best medical care for all," Meany said.

STRIKING CARPENTER is choked during arrest by police officers at Woodland, Wash., and required stitches to close a head wound. The "crime" with which John Clark was charged was kicking a strikebreaker's car as it entered the plant of Broadmore Mobile Homes, a subsidiary of the union-busting Fleetwood Industries. Union officials said Clark was wearing soft tennis shoes when he was supposed to have damaged the vehicle by kicking it. Pickets, limited to two at each gate, are outnumbered by police and company guards "protecting" strike-breakers.

Unity March Protests Harassment of Strikers

Woodland, Wash.—Hundreds of union members throughout the Northwest paraded peacefully through this employer-dominated community in a demonstration of solidarity with members of a Carpenters local striking a trailer factory.

The show of support was area labor's response to police and court harassment of strikers, and to the union-busting tactics of Fleetwood Industries and its Broadmore Mobile Homes subsidiary here.

Strikers have been savagely beaten, union leaders charge, arrested and held in high bail for such nebulous offenses as shaking a fist at a strikebreaker and calling him a "scab" as he crossed the picket line.

Only two pickets have been permitted at each of the three plant gates. But the union reports that when the company began hiring strikebreakers, there were as many as nine city and county police cars to escort them through the picket lines, along with six company security guards with sawed-off shotguns and police dogs.

AFL-CIO Regional Dir. James J. Leary compared company and police actions to the union-busting tactics of the Thirties.

An amateur photographer snapped a graphic series of pictures showing police beating a striker they were arresting on the charge that he had "damaged" a strikebreaker's car by kicking at it as it entered the plant grounds.

Union officers said the striker, John Clark, was wearing soft tennis shoes when he was supposed to have kicked the car. Photographs showed Clark being choked by arresting officers and a beating on the head required stitches to close the wound. His bail was set at $950, substantially more than the bond set for two strikebreakers who were accused of beating a partially-invalided striker away from the plant to the point that he required hospitalization.

The labor march, in which members of a wide variety of crafts participated, has apparently resulted in a lessening of police and court harassment, strike leaders report.

Union members came from Vancouver, Longview and from Portland, Ore., paraded peacefully through the city streets and along the plant fence.

The Woodland plant is one of five Fleetwood enterprises where locals of the Carpenters are on strike. Two plants at Waco, Tex., have been struck along with facilities at West Moreland, Tenn., and Macomb, Ill.

The parent firm employs nearly 3,000 workers in 32 manufacturing plants and is a main target of a Carpenters organizing drive.

Lyle Hiller, Portland-based international representative of the Carpenters, said the company's policy is to move into a job-hungry community and enlist municipal support for a low-pay operation.

Local 1238 won bargaining rights in an NLRB election last June and struck in September after negotiations got nowhere and union members were fired.

Struck Airline, Clerks Step Up Contract Talks

Minneapolis—Efforts to settle the long strike of 3,500 Railway & Airline Clerks against Northwest Airlines intensified here as negotiations continued with the aid of a professional mediator.

Both sides have been meeting frequently at the Federal Building with Frank B. Marzitelli of St. Paul, an executive of the St. Paul Port Authority. He was jointly chosen to assist when all other efforts to reach agreement failed.

These developments followed a ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Earl Larson that Northwest violated the Railway Labor Act by promising to "protect" employes against enforcement of a union security agreement if they abandon the strike and return to work.

The court issued an order restraining airline management from interfering illegally with the strike.

Union members walked out July 8 and posted picket lines at 38 Northwest locations when management refused to improve a contract offer that would have left employes at a disadvantage with other airlines workers, BRAC said.

Deception as a Tactic

THE 1970 ELECTION campaign may go down in the record books as one of the most expensive, one of the most bitterly fought and one of the most divisive of this century. And regardless of the outcome it raises some fundamental problems for the nation in the months ahead.

It is proper and necessary that an election campaign sharply draw the issues and the differences between the candidates so that the voters can reach their decisions on the basis of fact and information.

But when the Administration, as it has in this campaign, introduces deception as a campaign tactic, then the nation suffers, for a democracy cannot thrive and grow and provide for its citizens if its leaders gear their appeal to a cynical political tactic.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a recent interview, pointed out that the Administration's maneuvering on what's happening to unemployment and inflation and other of the nation's economic ills is "plain ordinary calculated deception."

Commenting also on a major Administration political pitch developed in the campaign, Meany said:

"I don't think crime is a partisan matter. However, we have the Vice President trying to convince the people that crime is the special interest of what he calls the so-called radical liberals or members of the opposition party. . . . I think this is just plain old election bunk. I don't believe that any responsible public official, and this goes to both parties, I don't think there are any of them who would like to see the crime rate increase. . . ."

He added: "I think the American people are a little too smart to believe that crime is the property of one political party or the other, or that opposition to crime is confined to one political party."

THE NEW YORK TIMES columnist James Reston writes that the President is using the anxieties of the people "for partisan gain" and that "human frailty, human violence, human selfishness, war, crime, drugs and smut are somehow the fault of the Democratic Party and can be minimized by the election of Republicans."

Noting that Democrats are exploiting the fear of a depression just as the Republicans are appealing to the fear of anarchy, Reston says there is a fundamental difference:

"It is one thing to say: Vote for me or you may lose your job. It is much more serious to say: Vote Republican or you lose the moral basis of your life or maybe even life itself."

It is the injection of this latter theme into the campaign, along with the Administration's calculated deception on the state of the nation's economic health, that causes grave concern over the course of the election campaign.

The thrust of the Administration's campaign is to stretch to a dangerous degree the fabric of a democratic nation, to deepen the divisions and anxieties and, in Reston's words, to "erode the public and congressional trust on which effective government depends."

Trudeau's Crackdown on FLQ Employs a Dangerous Weapon

By John P. Roche

"THERE ARE A LOT of bleeding hearts around who just don't like to see people with helmets and guns. . . . It is more important to keep law and order in the society than to be worried about weak-kneed people." With these words Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau announced martial law and the suspension of constitutional rights in Quebec to deal with the terrorist activities of the Front for the Liberation of Quebec (FLQ). His decision was subsequently approved 190-16 by the Canadian Parliament.

That is quite a statement. Can you imagine the reaction that Pres. Nixon would get if he made a similar announcement? (Indeed, Trudeau makes Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew sound like a "radic-lib.")

However, the American Constitution has no provision for emergency powers of this sort. During the Civil War and World War II, similar techniques were improvised. Abraham Lincoln employed military sanctions against "Copperheads" and occasionally locked up disloyal editors without judicial sanction, but in 1866 the Supreme Court threw out the whole business as unconstitutional.

During World War II, the Army ran Hawaii by martial law, but in 1946 the Supreme Court asked itself the question: "Have the principles and practices developed during the birth and growth of our political institutions [supported the proposition] that loyal civilians in loyal territory should have their daily conduct governed by military orders substituted for criminal laws . . . ?" The answer: No!

Admittedly the court in both instances acted after the wars were over—and it did sustain in 1944 the detention of the American-Japanese on the West Coast, which Eugene Rostow called "our worst wartime mistake." But the principle is clear: the Bill of Rights can not be put on ice by Congress, let alone the President.

Those who consider the United States to be the "most repressive society in the world" might meditate on events in Canada. Every society is, of course, repressive to some extent—as Sigmund Freud pointed out, repression is the price we pay for civilization. But if one takes a hard look at American liberty—in comparative terms, not as measured by some perfectionist standards—we come out pretty well.

Let us take a close-up at the present plight of militant Quebec nationalists. The FLQ, which sponsored the kidnappings and murder, is by all accounts a tiny group on the fringe of French separatism—in fact, it is anti-nationalist with a weird Castro-Maoite line. Yet under its emergency powers the Canadian government can sweep up the whole separatist leadership and simply refrigerate it for 90 days.

Under the Canadian rules, drawn from British precedent, notably the Defense of the Realm Act (DORA), the police can take a suspect into preventive detention and there is no possible legal test for 90 days.

The Republic of South Africa has made wide and unscrupulous use of this detention—the minute a prime suspect emerges from one 90-day stretch, he is re-arrested and tucked away for another . . . and so on. What has been called "preventive detention" in various U.S. crime bills is in a completely different league—it is run by courts, not policemen.

IN SHORT, if you have been picked up in Quebec, you do not even have the opportunity to say "hello" to your lawyer for three months. You are removed from circulation by administrative decision and have three months to meditate on your sins. If you have not sinned—and most of those arrested had only the vaguest association with the FLQ—you can spend your time selecting some less perilous associates. For 90 days you have no legal recourse—and then no standing to sue for false arrest.

Prime Minister Trudeau is now a big man in law and order circles—only 16 New Democratic M.P.'s dared stand up against him. Part of the difficulty is that urban terrorism presents unique problems to the police—and Trudeau is absolutely right in refusing to compromise with the FLQ. But admitting all this, I am deeply disturbed, perhaps even a "weak-kneed tender heart." I prefer the admitted clumsiness and inefficiency of the American system.

Preventive detention, as the late Justice Robert Jackson pointed out in dissenting from the incarceration of the American-Japanese, is a dangerous weapon to have lying around the house. And its history suggests that it is habit-forming, that leaders can easily become addicted to it. The ferocity of Trudeau's rhetoric may have influenced me unduly, but I suggest that Canadians keep a close eye on him. He relished that dreadful confrontation just a bit too much for my suspicious taste.

Meany Broadcast:

Adequate Health Care Is Part Of Worker's Stake in Election

Following is the text of the second of two special radio broadcasts by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany entitled "The Worker's Stake in the 1970 Elections."

I WANT TO TALK to American workers about the state of America's health—about what's wrong with it, what must be done to improve it, and why Tuesday's elections are so important to the nation's health.

Except for one thing—the fear of unemployment—there is no fear that haunts the average American worker more than the fear of sickness, and the crushing medical bills and hospital bills that go with it.

Most union members have some kind of medical insurance, won by their unions at the bargaining table. But even that expensive insurance sometimes pays only a third of the cost of health care. And one American in four has no insurance at all.

We in the AFL-CIO believe that the time has come to recognize, once and for all, that the right to a decent standard of health care is a right of all Americans—not just the privilege of those who can pay.

We believe the finest medical care on earth should be available to rich and poor, black and white, young and old, employed and unemployed alike.

We believe that doctors should be rewarded for keeping their patients healthy, as well as for curing them when they are sick.

Legislation to do this, and to do it at a lower cost than Americans now spend for inadequate health care, has been introduced by forward-looking senators and congressmen, and they have labor's full support. The 92d Congress will decide whether we win or lose that fight.

The conservatives, who are seeking your vote, and the Administration say "No." They say America cannot afford a first-class, comprehensive system of health care for all its people. We say America can afford nothing less.

That same argument has been used in opposition to full employment, industrial safety laws, a higher minimum wage, consumer protection, clean air, clean water, better schools, reasonable interest rates. On all these issues, we are again told: America can't afford them.

America can afford them—all of them.

What America cannot afford is to do nothing—to slip backward, as we have been doing for the last two years under the present Administration.

Pres. Nixon promised to make America more productive; to create new jobs and to control inflation.

But production is lower than when Pres. Nixon took office. There are nearly 2 million more men and women, who need and want jobs and can't get them, than there were two years ago. The cost of living has risen to its highest point in history and interest rates have equaled a record that stood for 100 years.

Profits of the bankers have never been higher. Workers and consumers are bearing the burden of both inflation and recession.

The conservatives are just prescribing more of the same: high prices, high profits, high interest rates and high unemployment.

THIS NATION cannot afford that kind of leadership. Americans cannot afford a Congress that would sabotage progressive legislation and repeat the mistakes of the past.

It is time to get this nation moving again; time to put America back to work building a better nation.

To do that, Americans must elect senators and congressmen who care about workers and consumers, who will move this nation forward.

So my message to workers is this: Cast your ballot as if your job, your health, your pocketbook and your family's future depended on it. They really do. They are what is at stake in this election.

Don't let anybody mislead you with fiery rhetoric about phony issues.

Vote for candidates who believe that what America needs is what its workers and consumers need: full employment, fair wages and stable prices. Vote for candidates who want to build America and make it a better place for all Americans.

Vote for the candidates supported by COPE. You will be helping yourself, your family and your country.

'The Most Worrisome, Dangerous Campaign'

This is the single most worrisome and dangerous election campaign I've ever seen.

Democracy is government by the people. Plutocracy is government limited to the very rich. Well, we are very close to crossing the line between the two. The cost of running for office has been growing year by year.

The very rich, who alone can meet those costs, have been growing richer by the year.

It's become impossible to run for political office without being a millionaire, or worse, being beholden to rich interests who will pay your costs. The subtle switch from Congress representing the people to representing only the wealthy is actually taking place.

I shan't name names, but if you've been following the news, I don't have to. Men who were utterly unknown when this year began have leapt suddenly to fame and the right to run this country solely by pouring fabulous fortunes into the media.

They tell you you can't change the system. Mr. Dean Burch of the FCC is one who says that. Well, that is arrant nonsense; the British did it. There, men with modest means are on the same footing as wealthy candidates.

If we don't get a grip on things very soon, we're going to suffer something much worse than pollution or crime, and that is the evaporation of American democracy.

'There Should Have Been a Vote':

Delay of Job Safety Measure Pinned to Republican Filibuster

DESPITE AN ON-THE-JOB death toll exceeding casualties in the war in Viet Nam, key Republicans staged a last-minute filibuster to block passage in the Senate of a strong and effective job health and safety bill before Congress recessed, a union legislative specialist charged.

The Occupational Health & Safety bill "generated more heat" than almost any other issue in Congress and had survived earlier attempts to delay the bill in committee, said Jack Sheehan, legislative director of the Steelworkers.

"We were ready for a vote . . . there should have been a vote . . . the American electorate needed a vote to judge their congressmen and senators as they go to the polls next Tuesday," he asserted. Sheehan appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Sheehan said that the "foot-in-the-door type" of job health and safety bill the Administration and Chamber of Commerce are pushing would be a serious setback in the long drive to curb job-related accidents and hazards that now kill and injure more than 2.5 million American workers every year.

"If the Administration bill were enacted as a substitute for effective legislation, that's exactly what it would be . . . a substitute for the next 30 years," Sheehan warned. He said it would so fragment the mechanism for setting and enforcing job-safety standards that the law couldn't hope to meet the growing problems of industrial injury, sickness and death.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR MANY YEARS the National Labor Relations Board has been struggling with the problem of what to do with the anti-union employer who uses every trick in the book to keep from bargaining with his employes, thus frustrating their efforts to get a better deal for themselves.

The NLRB can find a company guilty of unfair labor practices; can order it to "cease and desist" from such practices; can order it to rehire an illegally discharged employe and can even order it to reimburse the fired worker for the wages he has lost, plus 6 percent interest.

But the NLRB, so far, has failed to come up with a way to compensate workers who have lost wage boosts and benefits that they might have gained had their employer lived up to his obligation to negotiate in all fairness with them.

This failure has not been for lack of trying on the part of NLRB trial examiners. Over the years they have proposed various ways to remedy the loss suffered by workers because of their employer's recalcitrance. The issue became whether the NLRB had the power to do what the trial examiners suggested.

In a case involving the Auto Workers against the Ex-Cell-O Corp. of Elwood, Ind., the board decided 3 to 2 to reject the urging of a trial examiner that the company be compelled to compensate "each of its employes for the monetary value of the minimum additional benefits, if any, including wages, which it is reasonable to conclude that the union would have been able to negotiate. . . ."

Two members of the board argued that the NLRB did not have the power to do this; two members argued that it did. Newly named chairman, Edward B. Miller, a Nixon appointee and a management lawyer, broke the tie. He voted against the remedy proposed by the trial examiner.

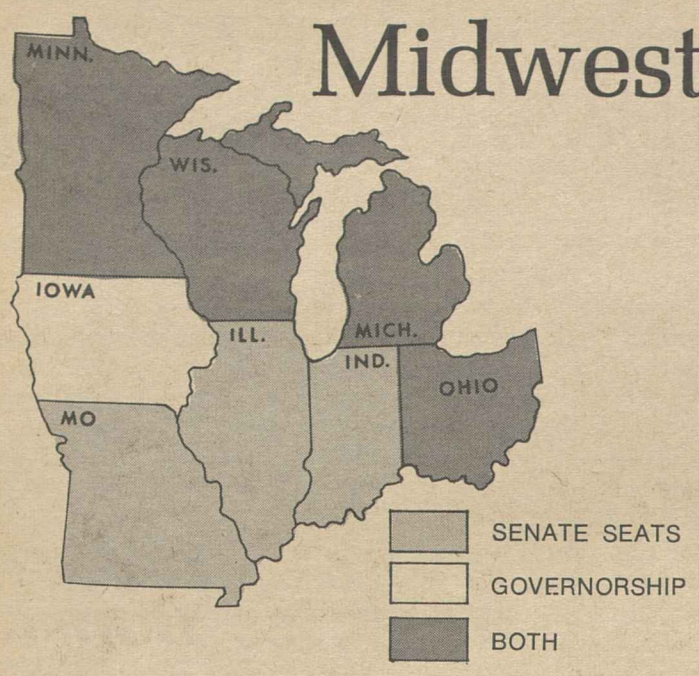
Miller's rationale was that not only did the board lack the power to approve the trial examiner's remedy, but that the remedy itself was in the nature of a "penalty" which the board is not authorized to impose.

Instead of harsh monetary "penalties," Miller would depend on acting with "firmness and despatch" notably in cutting down on delays in carrying out the law.

WHETHER THIS COURSE can be made to work in notorious cases that have come before the board—such as the interminable battle of the J. P. Stevens textile empire to avoid negotiating with its employes—is open to serious question; but what can be said thus far is that it hasn't worked.

In any event, the search for a remedy in cases such as that of the Ex-Cell-O Corp. isn't quite over. The NLRB itself has moved swiftly to ask for a court injunction ordering Ex-Cell-O to bargain with the union. This is an important step forward although it rejects the union proposals for compensating workers. And the U.S. Supreme Court may yet have to decide what power the NLRB has to act in such cases and what remedy it may impose.

Currently before the court is a somewhat similar case brought by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers against Tiidee Products, Inc. of Dayton, O.



In this case, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has upheld the union's thesis that the NLRB does have power to order a remedy such as that it rejected in the Ex-Cell-O case.

The NLRB doesn't want the Supreme Court to take jurisdiction on the grounds that the issue is "not ripe" for Supreme Court determination. The IUE, on the other hand, thinks that the issue is plenty ripe and has urged the court to take jurisdiction.

What is largely involved is the legal distinction between a "remedy" and a "penalty." As Miller has pointed out, the National Labor Relations Act authorized "remedies" such as "making whole" a worker who has been illegally fired, but leaves open what can be done about an employer who thwarts the law by thumbing his nose at collective bargaining.

Election Called Critical To National Health Plan

to establish that "the right to a decent standard of health is a right of all Americans—not just the privilege of those who can pay."

Most union members have some kind of medical insurance, negotiated at the bargaining table. But, Meany noted, "even that expensive insurance sometimes pays only a third of the cost of health care. And one American in four has no insurance at all."

The AFL-CIO president spelled out labor's basic principles on health care:

"We believe the finest medical care on earth should be available to rich and poor, black and white, young and old, employed and unemployed alike.

"We believe that doctors should be rewarded for keeping their patients healthy, as well as for curing them when they are sick."

All this can be accomplished at a lower cost than Americans now spend for "inadequate" health care, Meany noted.

And the 92nd Congress, to be elected Nov. 3, "will decide whether we win or lose that fight."

Meany noted that the response of the Administration and the conservative candidates in the election is that the nation "cannot afford" comprehensive health care for the American people.

The "same argument," he said, has been used to oppose a higher minimum wage, industrial safety laws, full employment programs, a crackdown on pollution and better schools.

But the truth, he stressed, is that America cannot afford to do nothing, "to slip backward as we have been doing for the last two years under the present Administration."

As he did in his first broadcast, Meany stressed the broken promises of the Nixon Administration "to make America more productive, to create new jobs and to control inflation."

Instead, he said, production is lower, unemployment is higher and living costs and interest rates have soared.

Bankers have profited, but "workers and consumers are bearing the burden of both inflation and recession."

That is the kind of leadership that "this nation cannot afford," Meany declared.

As was the case in 1960, after a period of economic stagnation and repeated recessions, "it is time to get this nation moving again; time to put America back to work building a better nation."

Meany urged union members and their families not to let conservative candidates "mislead you with fiery rhetoric about phony issues."

The candidates who deserve the votes of workers are those who will support programs for "full employment, fair wages and stable prices," he declared.

By voting for candidates supported by COPE, Meany stressed, "you will be helping yourself, your family and your country."

Guidelines Set In Dispute on Farm Workers

A formula for settling the dispute between the AFL-CIO Farm Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters was reached at a Washington, D.C., conference.

Federation Pres. George Meany and top officials met with acting Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons and other IBT officers to discuss the specific dispute over the organization of lettuce pickers and other field employes of vegetable growers in the Salinas, Calif., area.

After the meeting, Meany said UFWOC and the Teamsters agreed to follow a "very simple" formula. It calls for UFWOC to represent workers in the fields and for the Teamsters to retain jurisdiction in the areas where they have traditionally represented employes.

"Both sides have a clear understanding of how they should behave," Meany said. Application of the formula will be the task of Organization Dir. William L. Kircher for the AFL-CIO and Vice Pres. Einar Mohn for the Western Conference of Teamsters, he reported.

The meeting was "most cordial and fruitful," Meany told newsmen.

Six Democratic Seats Up:

Republicans See Hopes Fade For Senate Gain in Midwest

By David L. Perlman

The chill winds of late October have blown the stardust from the eyes of Republican strategists in an eight-state Midwest region where the GOP once had high hopes of political gains.

The richest prize was the region's seven Senate contests. Six Democratic seats were up for grabs and only one Republican seat had to be defended. And this was 1970, not 1964, when the Democratic senators coasted in on a Johnson landslide, or 1958, when a nationwide Democratic surge toppled Republican senators out of office.

Democratic gains in the House were wiped out in 1966 and 1968, and 66 of the region's 113 House seats are now held by Republicans.

The GOP lock is even stronger on the governorships, with all that implies in terms of state political organization and patronage.

Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin all have Republican governors. Only Missouri has stayed in the Democratic column.

So a Senate turnabout seemed overdue, at least to the Republicans.

But a week before the election, Democratic candidates were either leading or running neck-and-neck in all seven Senate races. Some of them were so far ahead that the coattail effect threatened to unseat Republicans who had been considered sure winners in other state contests.

And in the five states with gubernatorial contests—all of which now have Republican governors—only one Republican could be described as a likely winner. Three contests were considered tossups. And the most populous state in the region, Ohio, almost certainly will elect a Democratic governor.

In the House races, Democrats are favored to keep their 47 seats and should end up with a slight gain from districts which could go either way. The figure of 47 includes two vacant seats last held by Democrats.

Here's how the political picture looked in each state:

Illinois—Ralph T. Smith was appointed to the Senate after the death of Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen in 1969. But he has to win the election this year to serve out the remaining four years of the term. And people who have been following the Illinois campaign question whether he can do it.

The frontrunner now is Adlai E. Stevenson III. who besides looking like his late father proved the state's best Democratic votegetter when he was elected state treasurer and earlier in an at-large election to the Illinois House.

On the same night recently, Smith and Stevenson dined with their supporters at political rallies in Chicago. At the Conrad Hilton Hotel, 3,000 affluent Republicans paid $250 a plate for a multi-course dinner featuring "roast prime of blue ribbon beef au jus" and Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew. Across town, at the Germania Club, 4,000 Stevenson supporters turned out for a 99-cent dinner of cold cuts, potato salad and coffee on paper plates. But they were tasting victory.

There is no gubernatorial race in Illinois this year, and the House lineup is likely to remain a 12-12 split.

Indiana—Conservative Republican Richard L. Roudebush gave up a safe House seat to run against two-term Sen. Vance Hartke—a key target in the GOP campaign to win control of the Senate. Their COPE records point up the contrast. Hartke has had 53 "right" votes and 6 "wrong" votes on labor's scorecard; Roudebush voted "wrong" 52 times, "right" only 5 times. The election is close, but Hartke is given a slight edge.

Democrats expect to keep their present four House seats and see a good chance of ousting Republicans in three of the seven GOP seats. One key target is a Fort Wayne area district where Democrat J. Edward Roush, a former congressman, is running against incumbent Republican E. Ross Adair. Democrats are also hopeful of ousting Rep. Roger H. Zion in the Evansville area and Rep. David W. Dennis in the Muncie area.

Iowa—Republican Gov. Robert Ray is expected to win a second term and any change in the present 5-2 GOP margin in House seats would be an upset.

Michigan—Lenore Romney, wife of the Cabinet member and former two-term governor, George Romney, is clearly not the big votegetter Michigan Republicans had been seeking.

Polls and politicians agree that she will be soundly defeated by Sen. Philip A. Hart, a champion of consumer and liberal programs during two effective terms in the Senate.

Indeed, the landslide might be great enough to also bury Republican Gov. William G. Milliken and the rest of the state GOP ticket. State Sen. Sander M. Levin now is given an even chance of winning the governorship.

A Congressional Quarterly election report rates all seven Democratic House seats and nine of 12 Republican seats "safe" for incumbents. Republicans Marvin L. Esch, William S. Broomfield and Jack McDonald are considered leading, but not out of range of upsets. One of the Democratic challengers given a chance is August Scholle, recently retired as president of the Michigan AFL-CIO.

Minnesota—With Hubert Humphrey apparently a sure winner for the Senate seat abandoned by Eugene McCarthy, the political situation is very similar to that of Michigan.

Humphrey is campaigning with familiar zest, his party is united, and Pres. Nixon will presumably find a consolation job in his Administration for Rep. Clark MacGregor, who gave up his House seat to run for the Senate.

Humphrey's campaign is helping Wendell R. Anderson, the Democratic-Farmer-Labor candidate for governor. Anderson appears to have closed the lead given earlier to Republican Douglas M. Head, currently the state's attorney general.

Democrats see a good chance of winning the governorship, holding their present three House seats, and winning two of the five Republican seats, including the "safe" district being given up by MacGregor. A popular television news commentator, George Rice, is the Democratic candidate there.

Missouri—It would be a major upset if Republican State Attorney Gen. John C. Danforth defeated Sen. Stuart Symington's bid for a fourth term. And it would be surprising if he even came close.

Democrats have a 9-1 margin in House seats and have a good chance of holding them despite strong Republican campaigns in several districts.

Ohio — Democrat Howard W. Metzenbaum, who managed the two successful campaigns of retiring Sen. Stephen M. Young, has proved an effective campaigner in his own right. Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., who narrowly lost to Young six years ago in the big Johnson year, was an early favorite. But people who know Ohio politics are giving a thin lead to Metzenbaum, who is running on a strong statewide Democratic tticket.

Scandal rocked the Republican administration of Gov. James A. Rhodes, who is ineligible for a third term. And the repercussions certainly are hurting State Auditor Roger Cloud, who is the Republican gubernatorial candidate.

The clear favorite for governor is Democrat John J. Gilligan.

A strong Democratic top-of-the-ticket sweep would open the possibility of trimming the GOP's 18-5 margin in House seats.

The Ohio State AFL-CIO is putting on a sophisticated campaign for endorsed candidates, including attractive, sprightly written mailings to each congressional district.

Wisconsin—Sen. William Proxmire is rated an easy winner over his Republican opponent, basketball coach John E. Erickson.

Proxmire has an impressive record, broad political support and few political enemies. Erickson doesn't seem to have found any effective campaign issue.

The gubernatorial race is closer and rougher. The GOP candidate, Lt. Gov. Jack B. Olson, is trying to succeed retiring Gov. Warren P. Knowles through an Agnew-type campaign. But Patrick J. Lucey has a united Democratic Party behind him—deep wounds from previous campaigns appear to have fully healed—and is given a good chance for victory.

The House lineup is not expected to stray more than one seat either way from the present 6-4 Republican margin.

Howard Vogt Dead, Headed Tobacco Union

Richmond, Va.—Pres. Howard W. Vogt of the Tobacco Workers, who died of a heart attack at his home here, filled the union's top position "with honor and distinction," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in messages of sympathy.

Vogt's long career of service, his dedication and determination "won him admiration and friends" throughout the labor movement, they told his wife Eleanor, their son Howard, Jr., and union officers.

Vogt was buried in Forest Lawn Cemetery here after services in a funeral home Oct. 29. He died Oct. 26 while preparing to leave for his office in Washington, D.C.

Vogt's post was filled automatically on death, as the union constitution provides, by Vice Pres. René Rondou of Montreal, Canada. He will serve until the next convention in September 1972.

Vogt was elected a TWIU vice president in 1952 and became a full-time union representative nine years later. The 1968 convention elected him president.

To Preserve Strength:

Dispatchers to Seek Tie to Larger Group

Hollywood, Calif.—The Air Line Dispatchers voted at their 28th convention to seek affiliation of the 940-member union with a larger AFL-CIO union, provided ALDA can preserve its autonomy and structure.

ALDA is a 32-year-old union representing the licensed aircraft dispatchers of 25 scheduled airlines. Dispatchers for each airline exercise operational control over that line's flights and are jointly responsible with pilots for the safety of all flights.

ALDA Pres. Robert E. Commerce, the union's only full-time officer, reported that affiliation with some strong union, whether in or out of the aviation field, is necessary to hold union units together in the face of moves to disaffiliate.

Dispatchers had voted against an affiliation proposal in a referendum conducted last winter. Since then, members on three airlines sought to disaffiliate independently but the ALDA board of directors denied them permission to leave.

The action to affiliate as a whole was necessary, Commerce said, to hold all dispatchers together to preserve their professional status and their bargaining strength.

He said declining profits on some airlines have led to stiffened company resistance to union bargaining efforts. In addition, the Federal Aviation Administration is seeking to reduce route qualification and training requirements, a move the dispatchers claim would have an adverse effect on air safety.

Commerce said both problems are largely responsible for the union's decision to seek merger. Earlier this year, professional air traffic controllers affiliated with the Marine Engineers, a 17,000-member union of professional seamen, he noted.

Under present law, dispatchers must have at least five hours of "operating familiarization"—observation from the flight deck of a plane—in each type of plane for which they are qualifying. They must make at least one qualification trip on the flight deck each year over the area assigned to them, and must land and check as many airports as practical, the union said.

Before the convention the airlines asked the FAA to change the rule on annual qualifying flights. The union urged FAA to drop the proposal or hold a public hearing at which the change can be "thoroughly aired."

ALDA's position drew the support of the Conference of Transportation Trades, a group of 27 AFL-CIO unions representing workers in the transportation industry. It filed a statement saying the proposed change is "moving away from the objective of greater air traffic safety in exchange for unjustified air carrier economic savings" through the undesirable practice of depriving dispatchers of on-the-plane training.

ing a large group of potash miners.

In an abbreviated convention, delegates heard addresses from James Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Joseph Rourke, assistant COPE director, and Steelworkers Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony. Once the merger was approved, much of the normal convention work was eliminated.

Molony told the delegates that "you are coming into a union similar to your own." The Steelworkers, he said, already represent a majority of workers who mine gold, ore, nickel and copper.

Gildea said the pattern of industrial consolidation and the rising cost of providing "union services of the kind union members need and deserve" present "strong arguments" for union mergers.

"So we have seen a number of union mergers lately, in fields where union members have a deep community of interest," Gildea noted, "and we expect to see more."

All of them so far, he stressed, have strengthened the unions and benefited the members. "Nothing would advance labor's cause more than a couple of dozen more mergers of the same kind," he said.

Committees of the two unions reached a merger agreement in August, subject to ratification by the conventions.

In the merger statement, the two unions declared:

"This agreement is particularly appropriate in light of present conditions under which employers are merging and forming conglomerates, and in light of present economic conditions. It is necessary for us to move forward and merge in order to obtain maximum strength around the bargaining table.

"Each organization has recognized the contributions of the other to the welfare of the workers in their affiliated industries. Above all, they know that unity between the two organizations will bring fresh strength to the Steelworkers and to its local unions and members in affiliated industries. It will enable Stone Workers' officers and staff, its local unions and its members, joined with the Steelworkers, to devote even greater effort and resources to the essential task of improving wages, hours, working conditions and security of all the workers in the industries within its jurisdiction."

Vernon Jirikowic, IAM Staff, Dies

Vernon Jirikowic, research director of the Machinists, died Oct. 29 after an illness of several months. He was 46.

Born in Milwaukee, Jirikowic was a tool and diemaker apprentice and, after military service, studied at the University of Wisconsin where he received his B.A. and M.A. degrees in labor economics. After a year with the State, County & Municipal Employes in Milwaukee, he joined the IAM headquarters staff as a research economist in 1951 and was appointed research director in 1961.

He was a key figure in major union negotiations, represented the IAM at international conferences, and served on a number of government advisory boards. He was also vice chairman of the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League.

He is survived by wife, Doris, two daughters and a son, his parents, four sisters and three brothers.

Labor-Backed Candidates Boost Prospects of Liberals in South

By Rex Hardesty

Liberal hopes in the 1970 elections have been given a somewhat surprising boost from four labor-endorsed candidates who are making strong runs in the South.

The four are Lawton Chiles for the Senate and Reubin Askew for governor in Florida, Dale Bumpers for governor in Arkansas and Albert Gore for re-election to the Senate in Tennessee. All are Democrats.

Another labor-backed candidate, George C. Rawlings, is given a slimmer chance in his race for the Senate in Virginia.

Chiles, Askew and Bumpers are all young, aggressive newcomers facing better-known opponents. Gore, seeking a fourth Senate term, may be making one of the most surprising comebacks of the 1970 campaign in his race against Rep. William E. Brock III.

Gore calls himself the No. 1 target of the Nixon Administration and he was the object of an early visit from Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew. But Gore, whose vulnerability seemed verified when he got only 51 percent of the primary vote, started regaining the initiative by greeting Agnew at the Memphis airport and has seemingly kept it since in a free-swinging campaign.

Tennessee observers now say that Gore can win unless he is buried in Brock's last-minute saturation TV campaign.

Chiles and Askew are state legislators in their early 40s who are running as a team in Florida. They are taking full advantage of a deep split in the GOP ranks stemming from Rep. William C. Cramer's bitter Senate primary victory over G. Harrold Carswell, who was supported by Gov. Claude Kirk.

In Arkansas, Bumpers eliminated former six-term Gov. Orval Faubus after a survey showed he was almost unknown when the campaign began. Bumpers now faces still another and more difficult test against two-term incumbent Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller. Walter L. Carruth is the American Independent Party nominee.

Rawlings is in a three-way race for the Senate in Virginia in which incumbent Harry F. Byrd, Jr., running as an independent, is the acknowledged leader.

But Rawlings has given Virginians a campaign that many in the Old Dominion state never thought they would see—a statewide Democratic candidate running a liberal, populist campaign, speaking out against the big business interests that have dominated the state.

The mild-mannered Republican senatorial candidate, Garland, has been virtually disowned by the White House even though he makes clear his support of Pres. Nixon. The President has obviously written off his chances and is counting on Byrd to vote with the Republicans—as he did so often while holding office under the Democratic label.

In Texas, Democratic Senate candidate Lloyd M. Bentsen Jr., who ousted Ralph Yarborough in the primary to set up an all-conservative race, is believed to be ahead of Republican Rep. George Bush, but not with a commanding lead.

In other Senate races in the 13-state southern area, Democrats John Stennis of Mississippi and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia are running for re-election without major opposition.

In other gubernatorial contests, incumbent Democrat Preston Smith is opposed by Paul Eggers in Texas; Jimmy Carter scored a mild surprise in winning the Democratic nomination to oppose Hal Suit in Georgia, where Lester Maddox can't succeed himself and is running for lieutenant governor, and George Wallace is running without Republican opposition in Alabama. A Negro dentist, John Cashin, is opposing Wallace as a candidate of the National Democratic Party.

In Tennessee, Democratic gubernatorial candidate John Jay Hooker is believed to be running slightly behind Gore. So if the closing TV blitz wins for Brock, it could also help elect Memphis dentist Winfield Dunn over Hooker. For Hooker and Gore, the key is to hold down the GOP margins in the traditionally Republican eastern part of the state.

Like Gore, Bumpers will face a strong finish from a well-financed professional campaign. The initials "WR 70" in the form of a cattle brand have been highly visible in Arkansas, from the impressive campaign headquarters in downtown Little Rock to the two helicopters that fly the governor, his staff and other GOP hopefuls around the state.

Still, Bumpers was reported to hold a clear lead as the campaign moved into its final week.

One heavily-used Rockefeller TV spot claims a new job for Arkansas every 38 minutes. Bumpers retorts that Arkansas unemployment was above 5.5 percent well before the national average reached that level.

A Republican advertisement in both Little Rock papers depicted AFL-CIO State Pres. J. Bill Becker with a crown on his head as the kingmaker because of labor's endorsement of Bumpers.

A survey by the Associated Press estimated that Rockefeller will spend $100,000 on TV alone in the final three weeks of the campaign, compared to $41,000 for Bumpers.

Brock's expected whirlwind campaign climax started with full-page newspaper ads across the state saying, "Albert Gore has taken a position against school prayer three times."

Claiming that Brock has lost control of his campaign to "out-of-state professional propagandists," Gore shook his finger in Brock's face at a live debate at the University of Tennessee and said, "But you'd better regain control of it and stop this smear or you'll be ashamed of it the rest of your life."

Gore has hit hard at Brock's negative record in Congress.

In Florida, Askew's campaign for governor against the flamboyant Kirk is aided by the fact that Askew is from Pensacola, which is in the conservative northern Florida and Panhandle area.

If Askew holds Kirk to near a stand-off in that region, he's considered to have an excellent chance.

Chiles scored a surprisingly easy primary victory over Farris Bryant in the primary after walking the length of Florida, covering some 1,000 miles.

Chiles also attracted attention with his fried chicken and coke feast for $1-per-person while a $1,000-a-head Republican fundraiser was being held at the Fontainebleau Hotel, Miami Beach.

Of the 118 southern congressional seats, some 90 are considered safe for the incumbents, many of whom have no opposition.

Some of the close races are in North Carolina, where Republican Russell Jackson is challenging liberal Democrat Rep. Nick Galifianakis; in Kentucky, where Democrats are trying to seal their resurgence in the Louisville area by ousting Republican Rep. William O. Cowger; in Tennessee, where Democrat Richard Winningham has made a fight for the Chattanooga seat being vacated by Brock, and in South Carolina, where the seat Watson vacated is closely contested by Republican Floyd Spence and Democrat Heyward McDonald.

Meany Spurs Drive for Big Labor Vote

Calls for Record Union Turnout Against 'Fear, Smear' Campaign

economic issues by attempting to link the crime problem to liberal candidates.

In the second of two pre-election broadcasts over the CBS radio network, Meany reminded union members and their families that a major objective of organized labor—national health insurance—is at stake in the election, and the kind of Congress chosen by the voters "will decide whether we win or lose that fight." (Story, page 1.)

Implicit in Meany's appeal for a big turnout of union voters was the knowledge that the public has a history of apathy in off-year elections. The Census Bureau estimates that about 124 million Americans will be old enough to vote on Election Day, but in the last mid-term election in 1966 only 45.8 percent of the voting-age population actually went to the polls—and that represented a new record.

The ability of candidates to overcome this apathy and to swing the support of the large number of undecided voters holds the key to the election.

Late in 1969, Republicans were talking confidently of their prospects of bucking the tradition that the party in the White House usually loses congressional seats in the mid-term election. They predicted that the GOP would gain seats in the House rather than lose them, and even saw a chance of capturing the 31 seats necessary to wipe out the Democratic margin of control.

In January of this year, Republican strategists still had strong hopes that the party would post a net gain of at least seven new senators, which with Agnew's tie-breaking vote would give it a voting majority in the Senate. And many observers agreed that they could pull it off. Of the 35 Senate seats up this year, 25 are held by Democrats and eight of those were considered particularly vulnerable.

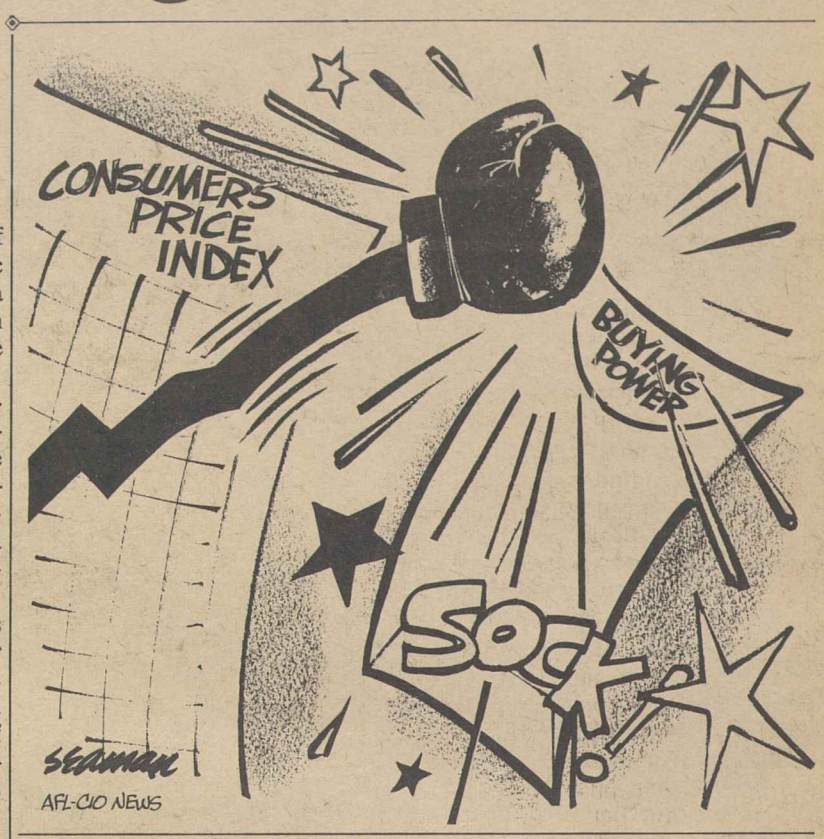
So sure were the Republicans of their chances to topple Democratic incumbents in the Senate that a number of GOP congressmen abandoned relatively safe House seats to take on the task.

But as the year drew on, as inflation continued unabated, as unemployment turned upward, the GOP prospects diminished. The failure of the Administration's economic policies gave the Democrats a strong central issue for the campaign.

At this stage, the Republicans would be happy just to hold their own in the House, and the White House now says Pres. Nixon would be satisfied with a net gain of one or two Republican senators—enough to swing a few close votes on Administration programs.

Many observers predict that the election will turn out just that way—hardly any change. But there are enough close races so that the Democrats could add a dozen or so seats in the House and perhaps post a gain of one or two in the Senate.



A number of the GOP's early targets in the Senate—such as Joseph D. Tydings in Maryland, Philip A. Hart in Michigan, Albert Gore in Tennessee, Frank E. Moss in Utah, Harrison A. Williams, Jr., in New Jersey—are considered well ahead or no worse than even with their opponents.

On the other hand, Republican incumbents George Murphy in California and Ralph T. Smith are trailing John Tunney and Adlai Stevenson III, and such seemingly safe GOP seats as Winston L. Prouty's in Vermont and Paul J. Fannin's in Arizona are under strong challenge.

In states where the Republicans were confident they could replace retiring Democrats—Ohio and Florida—the contests are rated as toss-ups.

The battle for control of the state houses finds the GOP more vulnerable, with Republicans holding 24 of the 35 governorships at issue. Here, the voters tend to focus on state and local issues, but the nationwide economic slump strengthens Democratic hopes for some gains.

The election of at least one house of the legislature in 45 states takes on special import this year. The state legislatures chosen next week will be responsible for congressional redistricting based on the 1970 census. Despite the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote rulings, the legislatures will have some latitude and the districts they carve out will inevitably favor one party or the other in 1972.

'Deception, Doubletalk' Laid to Administration

omy because its record is so poor on this score.

Furthermore, Meany emphasized "crime is not a partisan matter." He labeled Vice Pres. Agnew's attempt to link crime with the liberals "plain old election bunk."

"The American people are a little too smart to believe that crime is the property of one political party or the other, or that opposition to crime is confined to one political party," Meany declared.

As for Agnew's attacks on "radical-liberals," Meany said that "the radical tag has been used by political demagogues for a long, long time and it means nothing to me." The nation has to make progress in the 1970s, he said, and "this calls for liberals."

In response to the observation that civil rights issues have been muted in the campaign, Meany stressed that this was primarily because of the predominance of the economic issues. He accused the Administration of not doing much in the field of civil rights while "trying to balance water on both shoulders."

He cited Agnew's recent statement that Nixon is still determined to appoint a "southern strict constructionist" to the Supreme Court. This, he said, suggests another appointee with the same racial attitudes as Judges Clement Haynsworth and Harrold Carswell, whose appointments the Senate rejected.

Meany suggested, too, that the predominance of economic issues has diminished public concern with foreign policy as an election issue. But he gave Nixon credit for toning down the Viet Nam issue by "bringing our people home." The public, he said, "can see down the road that this thing is coming to an end."

As to the possible effects of the election on Nixon, Meany said that the President's plans will be determined by "what he thinks is best for him in November of 1972, no matter what takes place in the election." Meany made it clear that he did not condemn the President for this political shrewdness, and observed that Nixon "is not the first President who has been keenly political," citing Franklin Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson as other examples.

He said he does not expect the next Congress to be anti-labor. The legislative program labor will be pressing in that Congress, he said, will cover consumer protection, health, pollution, civil rights, inflation and "everything that affects the people in any way."

Meany re-emphasized labor's strong support for legislation to limit spending in election campaigns. Because television and radio time is costly and has a tremendous impact, Meany observed that the poorer candidates are at a serious disadvantage.

"If we got to the point where only the wealthy could hold office, I think this would be the end of our whole system of a democratic society," he said.

As a possible solution to this problem, Meany suggested that the federal government should allocate the amount to be spent. And he stressed that in a democracy, each candidate should have equal access to the media.

"I don't think that we should continue to look at a system without worry that evidently favors those with a whole lot of money," he concluded.

Bank Profits Go Sky High Along with Interest Rates

The Nixon Administration's "game plan" for the nation's economy may have plunged the nation into a recession at the same time that prices and interest rates continued to soar. But it's been just fine for the big banks.

A listing of third quarter earnings reports in Business Week magazine confirms that bank profits have gone from high to higher.

While most manufacturing profits were down from a year ago, virtually every major bank showed big gains.

For the giant Chase Manhattan, the $41 million profit it made during the third quarter of 1970 was 56.5 percent above the same quarter of 1969—and the profit for the first nine months of 1970 came to 23.6 percent above the comparable period a year ago.

Eight of the 12 banks on the list showed a profit jump in the third quarter and 10 out of 12 had higher profits for the first nine months.

Jobless Rate Above 6% In 38 Manpower Areas

Ga.; Fulton, Ky.; Minden, La.; Greenfield and Taunton, Mass.; Albany, Ore.; Orangeburg, S.C.; McAllen, Tex.; Ogden, Utah, and Pennsboro, W. Va.

Overall, 626 major and smaller job centers are now classified as having "substantial" or "persistent" unemployment, the Labor Dept. reported. "Persistent" unemployment means that the jobless rate has been 6 percent or more for a year and has been at least 50 percent above the U.S. average for several years.

Three large cities are now classed in the persistent unemployment category. They are Cleveland, Oakland and Newark. Four other major areas and 24 counties are also in the "persistent" category.

The report showed that five major areas have unemployment rates in the range of 9 to 11.9 percent. They are Lowell, Mass.; Wichita, Kan.; Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., and Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich.

An unemployment rate of 12 percent or more exists in Mayaguez and Ponce, Puerto Rico.

House Speaker John W. McCormack, commenting on the report in advance of its release, said that the growing list of centers affected by high unemployment is proof of the "failing economic policies" of the Nixon Administration. He pointed out that when Pres. Nixon took office there were only six major centers on the "substantial" unemployment list.

McCormack also said there are firm indications that the nation's total unemployment rate is approaching 6 percent. The jobless rate surged to 5.5 percent in September from 5.1 percent the month before.

Administration spokesmen have downplayed "the seriousness of the situation," McCormack charged, although the rise of unemployment has accelerated in the past few months.

"Another great tragedy of this demeaning joblessness," he said, is that it is expanding at a time when there is so much that needs to be done.

"This Congress initiated and passed legislation to provide an effective and practical method of combatting unemployment through community facilities improvement. It also initiated and passed legislation giving the President authority to control inflation and interest rates. To date the President has refused to exercise the authority given him, although conditions continue to deteriorate."

Yet, he said, "the President and the top officials of his Administration are on the campaign trail ignoring the major issue of the day—the economy. They continue to try to distract from the evident failures of their economic policies by playing on the fears and emotions of the people."

ILGWU Aids Puerto Rican Flood Victims

New York—The Ladies' Garment Workers have allocated $50,000 for the relief of victims of the recent flood disaster in Puerto Rico.

The floods, caused by seven days of heavy rains, left 50 dead and more than 10,000 homeless and caused millions of dollars in damage. The relief funds, ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg said, will be used primarily to provide clothing, medicines and food for victims.

In addition, the ILGWU, which has some 16,000 members working and living in all sections of the island, has volunteered the use of its two mobile health units for emergency relief purposes.

The relief fund will be administered through the ILGWU office in San Juan by a special committee of Locals 600 and 601 headed by ILGWU Vice Pres. Alberto Sanchez and Regional Dir. Clifford Depin.

Surge of Liberal Victories Blocks GOP Congress Bid

THE RESULTS OF AN EFFECTIVE COPE campaign are checked by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at Federation headquarters election night with COPE Deputy Director Joseph Rourke as area directors call national director of COPE Al Barkan.

Meany Cites Gains, Hails Labor's Role

By John M. Barry

A surge of Democratic victories in the mid-term elections bolstered the party across the country as a heavy turnout of voters repudiated the Nixon Administration's undisguised appeal to their fears in a bid for Republican control of Congress.

The GOP fell far short of its primary objective to win a voting majority of the Senate, adding only two of the net gain of seven seats it needed. And it lost at least eight seats in the House to widen the Democratic majority there and broaden the ranks of liberal congressmen.

Perhaps even more significant was the pickup of as many as 11 governorships by Democrats coupled with the capture of legislatures in such key states as California and Pennsylvania.

To AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the election results "proved that the voters would not be stampeded by the politics of fear and smear as practiced by Vice Pres. Agnew," by the extensive campaigning of Pres. Nixon himself, or by the lavish spending on behalf of Republican candidates.

The election, Meany said, "was a mandate to the Administration to stop trying to deceive the people about the real state of the nation's economic dilemma which has been created by the ill-advised fiscal and monetary policies of the Administration."

He suggested that the voters have in effect told the President to "act now to reduce unemployment, high prices, high interest rates and high medical costs" and to return to his announced "bring us together" policy by "curbing the Vice President's vicious tongue."

Meany extended "warm thanks" to those union members who took part in "COPE's most successful campaign to date." The thousands of volunteers working at the precinct level, he said, did "a splendid job and the legislative victories we will win in the next two years will be a direct result of their determined efforts."

The election was not without its disappointments for organized labor, and Meany cited particularly the losses of Senators Albert Gore in Tennessee and Joseph Tydings in Maryland. But, he emphasized:

"It was significant in the majority of the states where the President and Vice President campaigned long and extensively against labor's friends that they were roundly repudiated." (Text, Page 6.)

Besides Tydings and Gore, the Democrats lost Senate seats to the Republicans in Ohio, where Sen. Stephen Young is retiring, and in Connecticut, where Sen. Thomas Dodd ran unsuccessfully as an independent.

Against this, they added two liberals to the Senate roster as Rep.

Democrats Add House Seats, Keep Firm Control of Senate

By David L. Perlman

America's voters refused to give the Nixon Administration a vote of confidence and re-elected the vast majority of liberal senators and congressmen the White House had targeted for defeat.

As a result, the 92nd Congress that will take office in January will be firmly Democratic, with a conservative pickup in the Senate balanced out by a clear gain in liberal strength in the House.

An independent-minded Congress will continue to reshape the President's programs and priorities. And the votes of a group of moderate-to-liberal Republicans will still be essential to counter the defection of conservative Democrats on many key issues.

Senate

Republicans were able to win only 12 of the 35 Senate seats at issue on Nov. 3.

It was supposed to be the GOP's big year, but it wasn't. Twenty-five of the 57 Democratic Senate seats were up for election; only 10 of the 43 seats held by Republicans were at stake.

After all the shuffles, Republicans ended up with a pickup of only two Senate seats—a crushing putdown of the party's hopes for controlling the Senate in the 92nd Congress.

In state after state, liberal Democrats ran stronger than predicted. And two big states—California and Illinois—replaced conservative Republicans with liberal Democrats.

But there were Democratic casualties, too. Both veteran Sen. Albert Gore in Tennessee and freshman Sen. Joseph D. Tydings in Maryland lost their re-election bids.

Adding the replacement of a liberal Republican by a conservative in New York, the capture of a previously Democratic seat by the GOP in Ohio, and the earlier primary defeat of Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough by a conservative Democrat in Texas,

House

The election returns dented but did not break the power of the conservative coalition in the House.

There was no sweeping change comparable to the massive Democratic gains in 1964 or the big Republican comeback of 1966.

But the net effect of some two dozen changes in party control was a solid gain for both the Democratic majority and the liberal minority in the House.

With the help of some Republican votes, it could translate into a liberal majority on a number of key issues.

The 1970 congressional elections confirmed the Democrats as the nation's majority party.

All 435 House seats were at stake and Democrats won at least 254 of them. That's a net gain of eight seats and a solid 73-vote majority even if a still undecided Kentucky race is won by the Republican incumbent.

The pattern of the pickup reflected impressive Democratic strength.

Seats held by incumbents are always the hardest

Republican Governors Swept Out in 13 States

By John R. Oravec

The biggest gains for the Democrats in the 1970 election came in the gubernatorial contests as voters swept Republicans out of office in 13 states, giving the Democrats a majority of governors for the first time since 1966.

Beyond the immediate effect of the turnover on the states involved is the long-range political impact on the 1972 presidential nominations and on congressional redistricting that will influence the makeup of Congress for the next 10 years. In both areas, the shift of governors can only enhance the prospects of the Democrats.

Republicans went into the election holding a 32-18 edge. But Democrats turned the tide to take control of 28 state houses, leaving 21 for the Republicans.

The gubernatorial contest in Rhode Island was too close to call as the AFL-CIO News went to press with the incumbent

VICTORY SMILES are in order for Democratic candidate Reubin Askew and his wife as he unseated Republican Gov. Claude R. Kirk, Jr., in Florida. The Nixon Administration had campaigned heavily for Kirk.

GOP Gains in South Offset by Reversals

One era of American politics died, but perhaps another one was born in the 1970 elections in the South.

When Sen. Albert Gore was beaten in Tennessee, the last of the veteran liberal-populist southern senators disappeared, what with Sen. Ralph Yarborough beaten earlier in the Texas primary. And when Democratic gubernatorial candidate John Jay Hooker also lost in Tennessee, it became the first state of the Old Confederacy since Reconstruction to have all three of its major state offices—two senators and a governor—held by the Republicans. Gore was beaten by Rep. William E. Brock III and Hooker lost to Winfield Dunn.

That's exactly the kind of sweep the GOP had in mind for Florida in 1970, but instead the victories of Democrats Lawton Chiles for senator and Reubin Askew for governor may have signalled the beginning of a younger set of populist-liberals in the South.

Chiles and Askew, together with gubernatorial candidate Dale Bumpers in Arkansas, ran with labor-liberal endorsements and won.

Chiles and Askew knocked the Nixon Administration's "southern strategy" astray by winning in Florida. John C. West's victory in the South Carolina governor's race added to that impact. West also dented the prestige of conservative South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, the Dixiecrat-turned-Republican who figured prominently in Pres. Nixon's 1968 convention decisions.

Chiles defeated conservative Rep. William C. Cramer and Askew beat maverick Gov. Claude Kirk as both benefited from a GOP split.

West defeated Rep. Albert Watson, one of the most conservative members in the House with a COPE voting record of 2 right and 43 wrong. Thurmond campaigned actively for Watson.

Bumpers scored a sweeping victory over two-term GOP Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller, whose free-spending campaign failed to stem the tide.

Only one House seat changed parties in the entire 13-state southern and border region. That was in Virginia, where Winchester Republican J. Kenneth Robinson took over the Shenandoah Valley seat vacated by the retirement of Democrat John Marsh. Robinson had lost narrowly to Marsh in 1968.

One other switch was possible in Kentucky, where Democrats were trying to cap their resurgence in Louisville by ousting GOP Rep. William O. Cowger with State Sen. Romano Mazzoli. Less than 300 votes separated them in a race that may take a recount to decide.

Otherwise, southern House races were largely a question of incumbents being returned, most of them Democrats and many without opposition.

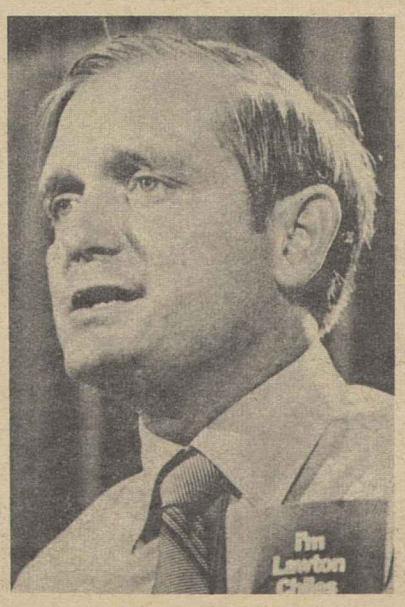
The same was true of two of the 13-state area's six Senate races—in West Virginia, where Robert C. Byrd was re-elected, and in Mississippi, where John Stennis was re-elected, both with only token opposition.

Rawlings was the Democratic nominee in losing to incumbent Harry F. Byrd, Jr., who chose to run as an independent rather than swear fealty to any national Democrats. Rawlings didn't come close enough to raise any liberal hopes of ousting the Byrd machine, but he did finish well ahead of Republican Ray L. Garland.

The South's other Senate race saw Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr., beat Republican George Bush in Texas, an all-conservative race which nonetheless added to the failure of GOP hopes of organizing the new Senate. Democrat Preston Smith was re-elected governor of Texas.



Other governor's races saw George Wallace return to the Alabama statehouse. In Georgia Democrat Jimmy Carter easily defeated Republican Hal Suit.

But Georgia Gov. Lester Maddox, who could not succeed himself, was easily elected lieutenant governor.

Also in Georgia, COPE-endorsed Negro Andrew Young lost by about 18,000 votes in his bid to unseat conservative Republican Rep. Fletcher Thompson in an Atlanta district.

8-State Midwest Area Gives Major Victories to Democrats

By Rex Hardesty

Democrats, most of them labor-endorsed liberals, scored impressive victories throughout the Midwest, an eight-state region in which Republicans had sought to add some Senate seats to their domination of the area's governorships.

But the opposite happened. Democrats apparently kept their 6-1 margin in Senate seats and scored decisive gains in the five races for governor, turning a 5-0 Republican advantage into a 3-2 Democratic edge.

The victory by Democrat Adlai E. Stevenson III in Illinois offset the Republican seat gained by Robert Taft, Jr., in Ohio. Pending the outcome of Democratic Sen. Vance Hartke's cliffhanger against GOP challenger Richard L. Roudebush in Indiana, the Democrats could win six of the seven Senate seats at stake.

Democratic incumbents Philip A. Hart in Michigan, Stuart Symington in Missouri and William Proxmire in Wisconsin all kept their Senate seats easily and 1968 presidential nominee Hubert Humphrey headed toward a comeback by retaining the Minnesota seat for the Democrats.

Democrats took state houses away from the Republicans in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Ohio, but GOP incumbent William G. Milliken edged out Sander Levin in Michigan.

To complete the sweep, Democrats picked up four House seats, an impressive figure since it represents almost half of their net gain nation-wide in the 1970 elections.

The House victories came with or without the "coattail" help of big winners in state-wide races at the top of the ticket.

In Indiana, despite the tight Senate race, the Democrats picked up a House seat. In contrast, Democratic incumbent Hart won with 65 percent of the vote in Michigan, yet Republicans held their 12-7 margin in House seats there. Similarly, the Illinois House delegation remained in a 12-12 deadlock despite Stevenson's relatively easy Senate victory.

But coattails may have been present in Minnesota and Wisconsin. Humphrey's Senate victory spurred a recovery by the Democrat-Farmer-Labor party which swept Minnesota and put young State Sen. Wendell Anderson into the governor's chair. A gain of one House seat gave the Democrats a 4-4 standoff.

Wisconsin Democrats, led by the re-election of Proxmire, also won the governor's race and gained one House seat to leave the state's delegation at 5-5. The new governor is Democrat Patrick J. Lucey.

The House delegations stayed the same in Missouri and Iowa, where Republican Gov. Robert Ray won re-election over Robert Fulton, a former lieutenant governor.

Ohio—Aided by a loan scandal involving state GOP officials, Democrat John J. Gilligan easily won the governorship, with the aid of a vigorous effort by the Ohio AFL-CIO. But labor-endorsed Howard Metzenbaum failed narrowly in his bid to beat Taft for the Senate seat being vacated by Democrat Stephen Young. Gilligan won by almost 300,000 votes while Metzenbaum lost by less than 70,000.

Taft, son of Ohio's longtime "Mr. Republican," had to overcome a bitter party split stemming from his primary victory over James Rhodes, a two-term governor who could not succeed himself.

Gilligan won over the state auditor, Roger Cloud, who had asked several of the incumbent state officials on the ballot with him to resign because of the loan scandal. They refused and Gilligan led a ticket which swept the state offices.

William J. Keating held Taft's Cincinnati seat for the GOP by beating black attorney Bailey Turner and State Sen. Charles J. Carney, a former union representative, was elected to Kirwan's Youngstown seat over Margaret Dennison, wife of a former congressman.

Indiana—If Hartke's thin margin over Roudebush lasts through the final tally, he will have survived one of the most bitter of the 1970 campaigns.

The difference between the two for labor is indicated in Hartke's lifetime COPE voting record of 53 right and only 6 wrong, almost the exact reversal of Roudebush's 5 right and 52 wrong.

The House seat gained by the Democrats in Indiana was taken by former congressman J. Edward Roush, who beat Rep. E. Ross Adair. Roush lost to Adair in 1968 when re-districting threw them together in a new Fort Wayne seat. Roush vowed then that he would beat Adair the next time. Adair has a COPE record of 9 right against 85 wrong.

Philip A. Sprague, a 47-year-old businessman, barely missed in his bid to oust GOP Rep. Earl F. Landgrebe and Elwood T. Hillis held Roudebush's old seat for the Republicans.

Michigan—Hart's decisive Senate victory over Lenore Romney, wife of the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development, apparently failed to carry to the governor's race, where incumbent Republican Milliken won a narrow victory over Levin.

Illinois—Traditional Democratic strongholds in Chicago came through for Stevenson, who successfully resisted incumbent Sen. Ralph T. Smith's efforts to paint him as a radical.

Pres. Nixon visited the state three times and Vice Pres. Agnew twice in an effort to defeat the 40-year-old Stevenson, son of the Democratic presidential nominee of the 1950s. But the bland Smith, who was appointed to fill the unexpired term of the late Everett Dirksen, did no better than the polls indicated he would.

Two new black congressmen were elected in Chicago, but they were merely retaining Democratic seats.

Ralph Metcalfe, a 60-year-old city alderman, won easily in the race to replace 84-year-old William Dawson, who retired from his heavily black South Side seat. Another black alderman, George Collins, defeated Republican Alex Zazrosky to fill the vacancy left by the death of Rep. Daniel Ronan in a West Side Cicero district.

Wisconsin—The sweep by Proxmire reached over 70 percent of the vote in one of the most decisive victories in Wisconsin history. The margin was also decisive for Lucey, who campaigned hard on the economic issues against Lt. Gov. Jack B. Olson.

Unlike his losing race against retiring Gov. Warren Knowles in 1966, Lucey had a united Democratic party behind him this time. David Carley, who lost the primary to Lucey in 1966, worked on his campaign staff and Donald O. Peterson, a "new politics" advocate who lost this year's primary, was also backing Lucey.

The Democrats achieved their 5-5 standoff in House seats through the victory of 31-year-old Leo Aspin, a former aide to Defense Sec. Robert McNamara. Aspin took the Racine-Kenosha seat away from Rep. Henry C. Schadeberg, who has a COPE record of 6 right and 41 wrong.

Missouri—Symington won his fourth Senate term with only slightly more trouble than expected in disposing of John C. Danforth, the 34-year-old minister, state attorney general and millionaire heir to the Ralston-Purina cereal fortune.

All 10 incumbent congressmen were returned, with Democrats continuing their 9-1 edge.

Iowa—Ray survived the Democratic blitz of governor's races in the Midwest, but not by as wide a margin as expected over Robert Fulton, a 41-year-old former lieutenant governor.

Rep. Fred Schwengel escaped a determined labor-liberal bid when he defeated Democrat Edward L. Mezvinsky in the Davenport-Iowa City House district.

Minnesota—The Humphrey-Anderson victory in Minnesota restored the DFL to control of both Senate seats and the governorship.

Humphrey defeated a strong Nixon Administration supporter, Rep. Clark McGregor, for the seat being vacated by Eugene McCarthy. McGregor's Administration support included a visit by Atty. Gen. John Mitchell even before the GOP primary. Several other cabinet members visited during the campaign.

Republicans managed to hold MacGregor's seat in the narrow victory by Bill Frenzel, a 42-year-old businessman. But the Democrats picked up a seat when Bill Bergland, a 41-year-old farmer, ousted Odin Langen, who has a six-term COPE record of 3 right and 67 wrong.

Republicans Lose Bid to Control Senate

Victories of Tunney, Stevenson Help Hold Democratic Majority

the Senate clearly shifted several degrees to the right.

But the change equally clearly fell short of Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew's claim of an "ideological" Administration majority in the Senate.

The big names in the Democratic Party won by smashing majorities —former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey leading his party to victory in Minnesota; his 1968 running mate Edmund Muskie a one-sided victor in Maine, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy amassing a strong vote of confidence in Massachusetts.

Close elections had been predicted in Illinois and California. But there was nothing close about the landslides that swept in Adlai Stevenson III to take the Illinois Senate seat away from Republican Ralph T. Smith and Democrat John V. Tunney over Sen. George Murphy in California.

The victories of Democrats Philip A. Hart in Michigan and Henry M. Jackson in Washington had been expected, but Hart ended up with about a 2-1 margin while Jackson crushed his opponent with a 5-1 vote. And William Proxmire had nearly a 3-1 victory in Wisconsin.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) was one of the supposedly vulnerable targets of the Agnew-Nixon campaigning. But he coasted to victory by more than 240,000 votes.

What had been billed as close elections in Utah, Nevada, Wyoming and North Dakota turned into walkaways for Democratic incumbents who weren't used to winning by such big margins.

Equally impressively, underdog Democratic candidates ran surprisingly close races against highly-favored Republican incumbents in Nebraska and Hawaii.

The Ohio and Indiana Senate races were expected to be cliff-hangers, and they were.

In Ohio, Democrat Howard M. Metzenbaum came close to capping his first try for public office by upsetting Robert Taft, Jr. But Taft pulled ahead to pick up the seat held by retiring Democratic Sen. Stephen M. Young.

It may be weeks before Indiana voters know for sure whom they have elected to the Senate. Democratic incumbent Vance Hartke held a thin lead, and a lengthy recount appeared probable.

Both the Senate Democratic Leader, Mike Mansfield of Montana, and Republican Leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania won re-election with ease.

Three states had unusual three-way Senate races, and in two of them candidates who did not run under either the Democratic or the Republican label were winners.

In Connecticut, Democratic Sen. Thomas J. Dodd bypassed his party's primary and sought re-election as an independent. He polled 260,000 votes, while Democrat Joseph Duffey, the ADA national chairman, received 360,000. But Republican Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., coasted in with 443,000 votes.

In Virginia, Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., shunned the Democratic label to win a clear majority over both a liberal Democratic opponent and a self-styled Nixon Republican who was ignored by the White House for fear of offending Byrd.

The nation's most publicized Senate race was in New York, where liberals were divided and Conservative Party candidate James L. Buckley, blessed by the White House, was the beneficiary. Buckley received about 2.26 million votes to 2.13 million for Democrat Richard L. Ottinger, and 1.43 million for incumbent Republican Sen. Charles E. Goodell, who also had the Liberal Party endorsement.

If Florida's new senator, Lawton Chiles, lives up to his campaign impressions, he will vote with Senate Democrats more often than his retiring predecessor, Spessard L. Holland. He not only keeps the seat Democratic, but also keeps it from the extremely conservative Republican candidate, Rep. William C. Cramer.

Both Gore in Tennessee and Tydings in Maryland had close escapes in their party primaries earlier this year.

Each made a strong comeback and Tydings was favored to win by a modest margin. But the winner in a close race was Rep. J. Glenn Beall, Jr., the son of the Republican senator Tydings upset six years ago.

The winner in Tennessee is a right-wing Republican, William E. Brock III, whose COPE record shows 45 "wrong" votes and only one "right" vote. It will be a sharp switch from Gore's career record of 65 "right," 16 "wrong" votes.

Other new faces in the Senate include William V. Roth, Delaware Republican, and Texas Democrat Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr.

Roth's record in the House indicates that he will be as conservative as retiring Sen. John J. Williams.

Bentsen will certainly be more conservative than the Democrat he beat in the primary, Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough. But his election was a blow to GOP strategists who had pumped large amounts of money into the campaign of Republican George Bush.

Western States Provide Net Gains for Liberals

Democrats picked up one of everything in the nation's five westernmost states, producing a split of the four Senate and governors' races at stake.

Rep. John V. Tunney ousted incumbent California Sen. George Murphy and William Egan defeated incumbent Gov. Keith Miller in Alaska. The Democrats also gained a net of one House seat, beating two incumbent Republicans but failing to hold Tunney's seat.

While Tunney was winning in California, incumbent Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan was also winning; while Egan was winning in Alaska, so was Republican Sen. Theodore F. Stevens; while Democrat John Burns was keeping his job in Hawaii, so was Republican Sen. Hiram Fong.

Finally, in Washington and Oregon, where there was only one statewide race, it was also one of each—Democratic Sen. Henry M. (Scoop) Jackson in Washington and Republican Gov. Tom McCall in Oregon both winning re-election.

To labor and liberals, none of the races was as easy as Jackson's nor as important as Tunney's. Jackson defeated GOP State Sen. Charles Elicker by a margin of almost 6 to 1. And Tunney not only ousted one of the nation's most conservative senators, he was one of only two liberals in the country to remove conservative incumbents, dooming the Nixon Administration plans to win GOP control of the Senate.

To do so, Tunney had to withstand an attempt by Murphy to tie him to the rocks that were thrown at Nixon in San Jose, Calif., in the last days of the campaign.

Reagan, the darling of the GOP's rightwing, ran some 40,000 votes behind Tunney, but still disposed of Jess Unruh, who has figured in the internecine warfare among state Democrats during the past decade.

Going down to defeat with Murphy was Max Rafferty, the arch-conservative state superintendent of education who was defeated by Negro William Riles. Rafferty also failed in his 1968 bid for the Senate. The man who beat Rafferty two years ago, Alan Cranston, now teams with Tunney to give California one of the nation's most labor-oriented Senate teams: Cranston has a 12-0 record of right votes on the COPE scoreboard while Tunney is 32-2.

Jackson's romp in Washington was accompanied by a victory by labor-endorsed Mike McCormack over Republican incumbent Catherine May, giving Democrats a 6-1 margin in the House delegation. Nicholas J. Begich, also with labor's endorsement, beat Republican Frank Murkowski for Alaska's lone House seat, which was vacated by Howard W. Pollock for an unsuccessful try at the GOP gubernatorial nomination.

But the Democratic gain in the five-state region was left at one when Republican Victor A. Veysey defeated David A. Tunno.

Meany Backs March Against Dystrophy

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has appealed to "all AFL-CIO affiliates and their members, through their community service activities," to support this year's March against Muscular Dystrophy.

In a letter to Jerry Lewis, national chairman of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America, Meany wrote that while the MDAA had succeeded in reversing hereditary dystrophy in an animal species, "I know that it will take much more time and money to find the causes and cures of neuromuscular disorders in man."

Key Republican Losses Shake Up Plains States

The five Plains states came out of the elections as a major plus sign for the Democrats, who picked up four additional House seats and three state houses.

While holding their own in other races, the Democrats gave a scare to a number of Republicans thought to be home safe—including Nebraska Sen. Roman L. Hruska.

South Dakota was an especially happy surprise for the Democrats as they scored a clean sweep with a gain of two congressional seats and the governorship.

Republicans also lost congressional seats in North Dakota and Kansas and the governorships of Nebraska and Oklahoma.

This is how the major contests turned out state-by-state:

North Dakota—Incumbent Democratic Sen. Quentin N. Burdick amassed votes at a 2 to 1 ratio to defeat Republican Rep. Tom Kleppe. Burdick beat Kleppe, a millionaire businessman from Bismarck, in 1964 with 57.6 percent of the vote.

The Republican House seat that Kleppe had vacated was taken by Democratic State Sen. Arthur A. Link, in defeating Robert P. McCarney, a Bismarck auto dealer.

The eastern congressional district was retained by Republican Rep. Mark Andrews for his fifth term. He defeated a 29-year-old Democrat, James E. Brooks of Fargo.

South Dakota—Voters turned against the GOP with a vengeance to turn out incumbent Republican Gov. Frank Farrar and elect Democratic candidates to the two congressional seats held by retiring Republicans.

Thirty-eight-year-old Richard L. Kneip is only the second Democrat to be elected governor in the state in the past 13 elections.

Frank E. Denholm, a farmer, lawyer, former FBI agent and former county sheriff, defeated Republican Dexter H. Gunderson in the eastern congressional district. In the other congressional upset, James Abourzek outpolled Republican Fred Brady.

Nebraska—The campaign pledge of Democratic gubernatorial candidate J. James Exon that he advocated no increase in taxes appears to have paid off as he upset Republican incumbent Norbert T. Tiemann. When Tiemann was first elected in 1966, the state had no sales tax or income tax. It now has both. Exon, however, did not propose the repeal of the taxes.

Former Gov. Frank B. Morrison gave Hruska a stiff challenge and the race remained undecided late into the night before the conservative Republican edged out a narrow victory.

Republicans retained the three congressional seats they held going into the election.

Kansas—A Democrat was elected to one of the four House seats held by the Republicans while Democratic Gov. Robert Docking was re-elected to a third term. In defeating Republican challenger Kent Frizzell, Docking piled up a 70,000-vote lead. He won re-election in 1968 by only 37,000 votes.

In the second congressional district, Dr. William R. Roy, who holds both medical and law degrees, defeated Republican incumbent Rep. Chester L. Mize. Roy had been a Republican, but switched to the Democratic ticket shortly before the filing deadline.

The other three congressional seats remained in Republican control.

Oklahoma—Incumbent Republican Gov. Dewey F. Bartlett mostly ignored his Democratic challenger during the campaign, but the voters did not. They gave 39-year-old David Hall 336,552 votes to defeat Bartlett's bid for a second term. Bartlett polled 333,608 votes.

All incumbent congressmen were returned to office, keeping the state's lineup as it was, four Democrats and two Republicans.

State Parties Strengthened:

Turnover Gives Democrats Majority of Governorships

Democrat Frank Licht holding a thin lead.

Ohio is one of the biggest prizes in the Democratic victory. Here heavy labor support helped elect John J. Gilligan by more than 280,000 votes over Republican Roger Cloud, the state auditor.

In Pennsylvania, Milton J. Shapp defeated Republican Lt. Gov. Raymond J. Broderick by about 500,000 votes. This led the way for a Democratic landslide that gave the party control of both houses of the state legislature for the first time since 1936.

Florida's Republican Gov. Claude R. Kirk, Jr., plagued by a party feud, largely of his own making, was turned out of office by State Sen. Reubin O'Donovan Askew. The Democrat was little known when the campaign began, but polled about 230,000 more votes than Kirk.

Democrat Dale Bumpers, also a political unknown until he defeated former Gov. Orval E. Faubus in the primary, piled up a massive lead to unseat incumbent Winthrop Rockefeller in Arkansas.

But in New York, Republican Nelson A. Rockefeller had little difficulty in winning a fourth four-year term over Democratic-Liberal candidate Arthur J. Goldberg.

California voters returned incumbent Republican Ronald Reagan to the statehouse as he defeated former Democratic Assembly Speaker Jess Unruh by about 500,000 votes.

Scoring an upset in Nebraska was Democrat J. James Exon, who rode a wave of taxpayer protests to defeat Republican Gov. Norbert T. Tiemann. In South Dakota, 38-year-old Democrat Richard S. Kneip unseated Republican Frank Farrar.

Alaska's voters turned Republican Gov. Keith Miller out of office and brought back Democrat William A. Egan, the first governor of Alaska when it won statehood.

Minnesota elected Wendell R. Anderson over Republican Douglas M. Head to succeed the retiring GOP incumbent, Harold E. Levander. Liberal Democrat Patrick J. Lucey easily defeated Lt. Gov. Jack B. Olson in Wisconsin.

Another young liberal Democrat, Cecil Andrus, ousted conservative Republican Gov. Don Samuelson in Idaho.

The Republican-held seat in Nevada went to Democrat Mike O'Callaghan, a liberal. In New Mexico, popular liberal Democrat Bruce King was elected over Pete V. Domenici.

Oklahoma turned down the bid of Gov. Dewey F. Bartlett to succeed himself and elected the Democratic challenger David Hall.

In the southern states, Republicans made no gains except in Tennessee, where Winfield Dunn defeated John Jay Hooker for the seat held by retiring Democrat Gov. Buford Ellington. South Carolina elected Democrat John C. West over Rep. Albert W. Watson, who ran with the strong support of the Administration and Strom Thurmond, the state's Dixiecrat turned Republican Senator. The new Democratic governor in Georgia will be Jimmy Carter. George C. Wallace, running as a Democrat, won in Alabama without Republican opposition.

Incumbent Democratic governors winning re-election were John A. Burns in Hawaii, Robert Docking in Kansas, Kenneth M. Curtis in Maine, Marvin Mandel in Maryland, and Preston Smith in Texas.

Voters re-elected Republican governors John A. Love in Colorado, Francis Sargent in Massachusetts, William Milliken in Michigan, Walter Peterson in New Hampshire, Deane C. Davis in Vermont, and Stanley Hathaway in Wyoming.

Republicans scored a victory in Connecticut for the first time in 16 years with the election of Rep. Thomas J. Meskill over Democratic Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario.

Opposition Split Helps GOP Connecticut Gains

A deep division among Connecticut Democrats helped Republicans pick up a U.S. Senate seat and take over the governorship for the only net party shifts in the six New England states.

Still undecided, however, was the governorship of Rhode Island where the Democratic incumbent, Frank Licht, held a lead of 2,248 votes with about 7,500 absentee ballots remaining to be counted.

Elsewhere in the region, two important Democratic spokesmen in the Senate—Edmund S. Muskie in Maine and Edward M. Kennedy in Massachusetts—scored big victories. Both piled up votes in the 63 percent range, somewhat less than they polled six years ago in the Johnson landslide, but heavy enough to assure their continued influence in the party.

Muskie's vote-pulling strength may have been the factor that saved the Maine governorship for the Democrats as incumbent Kenneth M. Curtis won narrowly over Atty. Gen. James S. Erwin. Curtis's troubles stemmed largely from opposition to a new state income tax.

Taxes also were an issue in Rhode Island, where Licht was opposed by Herbert F. DiSimone. Sen. John O. Pastore easily won re-election over the Rev. John McLaughlin, a Jesuit priest.

Kennedy's big margin in Massachusetts appeared to have no bearing on the contest for governor, in which the incumbent liberal Republican, Francis W. Sargent, defeated Boston Mayor Kevin H. White.

The Connecticut Senate contest was a three-way affair, pitting the Rev. Joseph Duffey, a minister and the Democratic candidate, against Republican Rep. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., and the incumbent, Sen. Thomas Dodd, who chose to run as an independent. Duffey and Dodd between them outpolled Weicker by a comfortable margin, but the Republican had the winning plurality.

Growing GOP strength in the state was more clearly evident in the contest for governor as Rep. Thomas J. Meskill focused on local issues to defeat Democratic Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario.

In Vermont, Sen. Winston L. Prouty had a much easier time than had been predicted in winning re-election over former Democratic Gov. Philip Hoff, and Republican Gov. Deane C. Davis retained his post with an easy victory over State Sen. Leo O'Brien, Jr.

New Hampshire Gov. Walter Peterson was re-elected by a slim margin over conservative Democrat Roger J. Crowley.

Despite new faces in Connecticut and Massachusetts, the party lineup of House seats from the six states remained unchanged — 16 Democrats and nine Republicans.

Democratic Margin Widened in House

Party Scores Pickup Of at Least 8 Seats

to take over; most party changes come about when an incumbent is not seeking re-election and the seat is up for grabs.

But in this election, Democratic challengers ousted nine Republican incumbents, including several long-entrenched conservatives. Only two Democratic incumbents were beaten, and one of them was the victim of a redistricting that gave him a heavily Republican constituency.

Geographically, the Democratic gains were heaviest in the nation's midsection — from the Midwest through the Great Plains and Rocky Mountain states, traditional strongholds of the GOP.

The only Republican multi-seat pickup was in New York, where Democrats had a topheavy 26-15 margin and the GOP had high hopes for a six-seat pickup. But the net gain of two seats still left the congressional delegation with a 24-17 Democratic majority.

Only one seat in the South changed hands, and no one expects any change in the voting record of a Virginia Republican succeeding a Democrat who had 1 "right" vote and 48 "wrong" votes on the COPE tally.

On a state-by-state basis, here is where party changes took place:

Alaska—The state's lone congressional seat toppled to Democrat Nicholas J. Begich.

California—When John V. Tunney gave up his marginal district to make his successful Senate race, Republican Victor V. Veysey picked it up.

Colorado—Craig Barnes upset veteran Democrat Byron Rogers in the Democratic primary. But Denver District Atty. James D. McKevitt won the seat for the GOP with a hardline "law and order" campaign.

Connecticut—An even split. Republican Robert H. Steele, Jr., took the 2nd district seat vacant since the death of Democratic Rep. William St. Onge. But Mrs. Ella T. Grasso, the Democratic secretary of state, won the 6th district seat vacated by Republican Governor-elect Thomas Meskill.

Indiana—A former Democratic congressman, J. Edward Roush, who had an almost perfect COPE record, will represent the 4th district around Fort Wayne instead of Republican E. Ross Adair, who had very few "right" votes during 10 terms in the House.

Kansas—In the 2nd district, Democrat William L. Roy upset incumbent Chester L. Mize, an unexpected Democratic bonus.

Maryland—The district left open when Republican J. Glenn Beall moved to the Senate was won by Democrat Goodloe E. Byron, whose father and mother each held the seat for one term from 1939-43.

Minnesota — Conservative Republican Odin Langen held the rural 7th district for six terms, but the new congressman will be Democrat Bob Bergland.

Montana—Democrat Arnold Olsen had squeaked through by narrow margins for four terms, but he was edged out this year by Republican Richard G. Shoup.

New Mexico—After Ed Foreman moved from Texas to New Mexico, he was hailed as the first person elected to Congress from two states. Now, after his defeat by Democrat Harold L. Runnels, he can lay claim to being the first congressman denied re-election by voters of two states. A big liberal gain.

New York—Redistricting confuses the arithmetic but the Republicans ended up with two more seats than they now have. In the process, Republican Norman F. Lent took a now heavily Republican district away from Allard K. Lowenstein, Republican Peter A. Peyser took over the seat Richard L. Ottinger gave up to try for the Senate, and ex-football quarterback Jack F. Kemp took a seat Richard McCarthy had to abandon to make an unsuccessful primary race for the Democratic senatorial nomination.

One newly-created district went Democratic, another Republican, and in a battle between two incumbents, Democrat Samuel S. Stratton defeated liberal Republican Daniel E. Button. Liberal Democrat John G. Dow came back this year to win the seat he had lost in 1968 to Republican Martin B. McKneally.

North Dakota—Wheat farmers aren't very happy with the Administration farm bill and that may have helped Arthur A. Link take a Republican seat that Thomas S. Kleppe gave up for an unsuccessful run for the Senate.

Ohio—For 22 years, Republican William H. Ayres managed to win election from a heavily Democratic district in Akron, a strong union city. This year he lost his political magic and a liberal rubber company lawyer, John F. Seiberling, Jr., won the seat for the Democrats. Ayres was ranking Republican on the House Labor Committee, a title that now falls to Minnesota's Albert H. Quie.

South Dakota—A Democratic sweep in the state included both House seats, which had been held by conservative Republicans who didn't seek re-election.

Utah—Another case where a Republican incumbent gave up a safe seat for a futile run for the Senate. K. Gunn McKay, a nephew of the late Mormon church leader, won it for the Democrats.

Virginia—J. Kenneth Robinson won the 7th district where an incumbent Democrat did not seek re-election to give the GOP a 6-4 majority in Virginia's House seats.

Washington—After six terms, conservative Republican Catherine May was upset by Democrat Mike McCormack.

Wisconsin—Another upset as Democrat Les Aspin toppled Henry C. Schadeberg, whose COPE record showed 41 "wrong" and 6 "right" votes.

Wyoming—A comeback for former Rep. Teno Roncalio who took back the lone House seat for the Democrats.

BIG WINNERS in Senate elections were these big names in the Democratic Party. Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, left, was re-elected from Maine; Hubert H. Humphrey returned to the Senate from Minnesota six years after he had left to become vice president, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy won re-election from Massachusetts.

Two Senate Losses Mar Showing Of Liberals in Mid-Atlantic Area

Two Senate races marred an otherwise impressive showing by liberal Democrats in the populous mid-Atlantic region—New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Delaware.

The bright spots were in Pennsylvania, where labor-backed Democrat Milton J. Shapp easily won the governorship of the nation's third largest state, and in New Jersey, where Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., led his party to an impressive victory.

But in New York, a liberal split and carefully-calculated Agnew-Nixon political gamesmanship enabled Conservative Party candidate James L. Buckley to be elected senator with only 39 percent of the vote.

He edged out Democrat Richard L. Ottinger, who had 37 percent. Incumbent Sen. Charles E. Goodell, who ran on both the Republican and Liberal Party lines, trailed with 24 percent. Goodell was a conservative congressman when Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller appointed him to the Senate after the death of Robert F. Kennedy. It was his abrupt swing to the left that put him on the White House purge list. Goodell received 226,000 votes on the Liberal Party line—more than twice the margin by which Buckley outpolled Ottinger.

In Maryland, Democratic Sen. Joseph D. Tydings had made his mark as an effective senator. But the gun lobby had targeted him for defeat and a low voter turnout in Baltimore contributed to his narrow loss.

The victor was Rep. Glenn Beall, Jr., the son of the Republican senator Tydings had defeated in 1964. Beall has a moderate voting record in the House, but is now indebted to the White House.

While Tydings went down, Maryland voters gave a landslide victory to Democratic Gov. Marvin Mandel, who was named to the post by the legislature after Spiro Agnew became vice president. And a Democrat picked up the House seat Beall gave up to run for the Senate.

There were no surprises in other major contests. Rockefeller won his widely-predicted re-election in New York, Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott had no trouble winning a new term in Pennsylvania and conservative Republican William V. Roth, Jr., won his expected promotion to the Delaware Senate seat left open by the retirement of equally conservative Sen. John J. Williams.

In the House races, Democrats showed impressive strength. They held on to most marginal districts in New York despite a redistricting which gave the GOP a net gain of two seats. They ousted two Republican incumbents to make up part of the loss of Democratic seats.

Most impressive, however, was the party's strong showing in New Jersey, where two of the nine Democratic seats were considered tossups and two others were listed as possible Republican gains.

All Democrats kept their seats and by impressive margins. Henry Helstoski, for example, had won all three of his terms in a heavily Republican district by less than 3,000 votes. This year, his winning margin was above 19,000. And Richard Roe, who barely won a special election last year, coasted in with 21,000 votes to spare.

The victory of Williams puts him in line to succeed Ralph Yarborough of Texas as chairman of the Senate Labor Committee in the 92nd Congress — assuming that Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) chooses to retain his chairmanship of the Public Works Committee.

Williams is the chief Senate sponsor of the labor-backed occupational safety and health bill and was a key target of White House efforts to defeat Senate liberals. He had strong support from New Jersey's labor movement—and from the state's voters who gave him a winning margin of 250,000 votes.

In Pennsylvania, the election of Shapp was coupled with a Democratic takeover of the legislature.

Apart from the legislative prospects this opens up, the statewide win has important political punch. Pennsylvania is scheduled to lose two congressional seats before the next election and it is the legislature which will draw the new district lines and the governor who will sign or veto the redistricting bill.

Pennsylvania Democrats retained their 14-13 margin in House seats and Delaware's lone seat stayed Republican.

GOVERNOR-ELECT Milton Shapp is embraced by his wife Muriel and son Richard as his victory in Pennsylvania led a Democratic landslide to carry both houses of the state legislature. Shapp defeated Republican Lt. Gov. Raymond Broderick.

Outreach Program Slated in Wichita

Wichita, Kan.—The Central & Western Kansas Building & Construction Trades Council has been awarded a one-year Labor Dept. contract for the operation of an Apprenticeship Outreach program.

A grant of $54,397 will be used to recruit and prepare 30 minority group youths for apprenticeship openings in the building crafts.

The Wichita project is the 81st Outreach program being operated by the building trades and other organizations in 83 major industrial centers across the country.

Peru Daily Lauds CARE Relief Work

Volunteer efforts of many American organizations including the AFL-CIO to bring aid to thousands of Peruvian earthquake victims through CARE were praised by the Lima daily newspaper La Prensa.

"The performance of the Cooperative for American Relief Everywhere, Inc. [CARE] is effective and deserving of praise," the publication said.

"This is an organization," it continued, "that responds wherever there is an emergency situation or some urgent problem without considering the political beliefs of the countries helped. . . ."

The AFL-CIO efforts to aid the earthquake victims centered on the delivery of $300,000 worth of medicines and baby food. The operation was conducted by the federation's Inter-American Affairs office of the Dept. of International Affairs.

Election 1970

TO THE AFL-CIO, yesterday's results were a source of great satisfaction, with some keen disappointments.

The results and the big turnout prove that the voters would not be stampeded by:

- The politics of fear and smear practiced by Vice Pres. Agnew;
- The most lavishly financed campaign in off-year history—that of the Republican party;
- The extravagant and wasteful expenditures of presidential prestige and dignity;
- The dismal predictions of commentators that America had lost confidence in its ability to govern itself.

It was a mandate to the Administration to stop trying to deceive the people about the real state of the nation's economic dilemma which has been created by the ill-advised fiscal and monetary policies of the Administration.

As we see it, the voters delivered several key messages to the President. They were to:

Act now to reduce high unemployment, high prices, high interest rates and high medical costs;

Return to his announced "bring us together" policy by curbing the Vice President's vicious tongue.

We feel keenly the losses of some Senate friends for whom we worked hard, especially the defeats of Senators Gore and Tydings. We consider the New York senatorial results to be a disgrace.

The Administration's claim to victory in New York, achieved by cutting the political throat of a member of the President's own party, is somewhat grotesque.

It was significant in the majority of the states where the President and Vice President campaigned long and extensively against labor's friends that they were roundly repudiated.

Overall, we find the congressional outlook to be a gain and the victories of liberals to the governorships of key states to be most satisfying.

Finally, I want to extend my warm thanks to all the union members who participated in COPE's most successful campaign to date. It was well planned and well executed but it depended upon the hard work of thousands of volunteers at the precinct level. They did a splendid job and the legislative victories we will win in the next two years will be a direct result of their determined efforts.

Worst Kind of Permissiveness Is Weak Firearm Controls

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE certain aspects of American behavior which simply leave me baffled: the resistance of ice hockey players to helmets, the willingness of commuters to drive 70 miles a day rather than take the train, and our incredible leniency towards drunken driving, to take a few examples. But the thing that puts all these in the shade is our casual attitude towards firearms. The other day some statistician noted that there are more guns in the United States than there are people.

Let us take one painful example. A young woman walked into a Portland, Ore., hardware store and asked for a .357 Magnum handgun (a real cannon) and what might be called in a boutique its "accessories." She paid cash and signed a piece of paper and that was that.

Perhaps the clerk checked to make sure she was over 18 (or whatever the shooting age may be in Oregon), but she walked out of the store with the gun. Her name was Susan Saxe—she is currently on the FBI list as an alleged accomplice in a bank robbery in Brighton, Mass., where a policeman was killed.

What kind of a lunatic business is this? Setting aside for the moment the question of rifles and shotguns, isn't it perfectly reasonable to suggest that no private citizen in the United States should be permitted to carry a pistol? Unless—as is the case in New York and other states with tight laws—he has been given a permit by the police. This seems so sensible that it is hard to believe anyone would even want to argue about it.

Yet the minute one makes this suggestion, the howls go up. First, the critic is accused of lack of virility, or manliness—a person who wants us to become a nation of effete snobs. Now here I will confess: gunfire makes me nervous, and I am particularly sensitive about being shot at. In addition, I do not enjoy hunting—my only training was in shooting at people and my favorite weapon, the Browning automatic rifle (BAR), is not exactly suited for deer stalking.

Maybe a pistol gives you an ego boost. When I was in Viet Nam, I was offered a handgun for self-defense and for a minute I felt a manly throb. Then I realized (1) that I couldn't hit a barn at 10 feet with a pistol, and (2) that the problem was land mines and mortar fire.

(In this connection, there was once a hilarious picture of Sen. Charles Percy in the papers. Percy, visiting the Mekong Delta in a chopper, came under 82 mm. mortar fire in a landing zone. While others hugged the ground, the senator was apparently shooting a pistol at the tree tops—the range of an 82 mm. is roughly 4,000 yards, hardly subject to suppression by a .45 pistol.)

At any rate, I turned down my chance to pack a gun, and if this makes me an effete snob, you can make the most of it.

THEN THE OPPONENTS of arms control march in triumphantly with a collection of the phoniest statistical propositions we have seen since the cigarette companies folded their hands and allowed as how smoking cigarettes was not beneficial to the health. In this context, we are shown that the homicide rate is highest precisely where regulations are the strictest.

Now if I told you that the greatest number of auto accidents occurred in the states with the most cars, you would throw the paper away this second. But that is the level of these generalizations.

Finally, if you have not quit arguing because you are ashamed of being effete, and you have plowed your way through the bogus statistics, they hit you with the Sunday punch: it is part of a plot to disarm Americans and leave them at the mercy of the ..... (The blank can be filled in with different ogres as local conditions dictate: "Blacks," "Reds," "Hippies," "Mafia," etc.)

Sorry, it's still no go. Handguns should be banned from private circulation and only used (for example, by pistol clubs that sponsor marksmanship competitions, and the like) under strict regulation. I will return to the question of rifles and shotguns on another occasion, but hunters do have a legitimate interest that does not relate to the rights of a young woman who wants to buy a .357 Magnum and help launch a revolution. Let's end this absurd and dangerous brand of permissiveness.

Muskie on Campaign:

'Politics of Fear' Assailed As Danger to Democracy

Following are excerpts from the nationwide election eve television broadcast by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.).

IN THE HEAT of our campaigns, we have all become accustomed to a little anger and exaggeration. Yet, on the whole, our political process has served us well, presenting for your judgment a range of answers to the country's problems and a choice between men who seek the honor of public service.

That is our system. It has worked for almost 200 years, longer than any other political system in the world. And it still works.

But in these elections of 1970, something has gone wrong. There has been name calling and deception of almost unprecedented volume. Honorable men have been slandered. Faithful servants of the country have had their motives questioned and their patriotism doubted.

This attack is not simply the overzealousness of a few local leaders. It has been led, inspired and guided from the highest offices in the land.

The danger from this assault is not that a few more Democrats might be defeated—the country can survive that. The true danger is that the American people will have been deprived of that public debate, that opportunity for fair judgment, which is the heartbeat of the democratic process. And that is something the country cannot afford.

Let me try to bring some clarity to this deliberate confusion. Let me begin with those issues of law and order, of violence and unrest, which have pervaded the rhetoric of this campaign.

I believe that any person who violates the law should be apprehended, prosecuted and punished, if found guilty. So does every candidate for office of both parties. And nearly all Americans agree.

I believe everyone has a right to feel secure, on the streets of his city and in the buildings where he works or studies. So does every candidate for office of both parties. And nearly all Americans agree.

Therefore, there is no issue of law and order, or of violence. There is only a problem. There is no disagreement about what we want. There are only different approaches to getting it. And the harsh and uncomfortable fact is that no one, in either party, has the final answer.

For four years, a conservative Republican has been governor of California. Yet there is no more law and order in California today than when he took office.

Pres. Nixon, like Pres. Johnson before him, has taken a firm stand. A Democratic Congress has passed sweeping legislation. Yet America is no more orderly or lawful nor its streets more safe than was the case two years ago, or four or six.

We must deal with symptoms—strive to prevent crime, halt violence and punish the wrongdoer.

But we must also look for the deeper causes, in the structure of our society.

If one of your loved ones is sick, you do not think it is soft or undisciplined of a doctor to try and discover the agents of illness. But you would soon discard a doctor who thought it enough to stand by the bed and righteously curse the disease.

Yet there are those who seek to turn our common distress to partisan advantages, not by offering better solutions but with empty threat and malicious slander.

THESE ATTACKS are dangerous in a more important sense, for they keep us from dealing with our problems.

Names and threats will not end the shame of ghettos and racial injustice, restore a degraded environment or end a long and bloody war.

Slogans and television commercials will not bring the working man that assurance of a constantly rising standard of life which was his only a few years ago and which has been cruelly snatched away.

No administration can be expected to solve the difficulties of America in two years. But we can fairly ask two things—that a start be made and that the nation be instilled with a sense of forward movement, of high purpose. This has not been done.

There are only two kinds of politics. They are not radical and reactionary, or conservative and liberal, or even Democratic and Republican. There are only the politics of fear and the politics of trust.

One says: You are encircled by monstrous dangers. Give us power over your freedom so we may protect you.

The other says: The world is a baffling and hazardous place, but it can be shaped to the will of men.

Ordinarily that division is not between parties, but between men and ideas. But this year the leaders of the Republican party have intentionally made that line a party line. They have confronted you with exactly that choice.

Young Workers, Students Team Up:

Frontlash Campaign Swells Rolls of Low-Income Voters

YOUNG WORKERS and students played key roles in the successful "Frontlash 70" drive to register low-income voters and help them understand the issues at stake in Nov. 3 elections, the chairman of the organization's executive board reported.

"It's a little soon to tell" just how much Frontlash 70 helped swell the total vote by registering voters and motivating them to cast their ballots, but it runs well into the "hundreds of thousands," said Penn Kemble. He noted that prime areas of Frontlash 70 effort included California, Illinois, Utah, Tennessee, Vermont and New Jersey, where "Senate races were looked upon by both parties as crucial, and low-income people really need very much to make their voices heard in elections."

Kemble, who is also chairman of the Youth Project on Democratic Change of the League for Industrial Democracy, cited restrictive state registration laws as a major obstacle to "greater participation by low-income people . . . in the democratic processes."

"It's really quite unfortunate that there are not uniform national standards" for voter qualification, he asserted, citing the example of Texas, where voters must "re-register every year . . . in January . . . some six or eight months before the election actually takes place." He pointed out that in California, where the registration law is much broader and Frontlash 70 volunteers could be deputized as voter registrars, more than 100,000 new voters were added to the rolls through the direct effort of the organization.

"That speaks pretty well for what young people can do when they put their minds to it," he declared.

KEMBLE REFUTED the charge that "unions aren't interested in young people," declaring that the Frontlash 70 experience proved that to be "quite a false charge."

He praised the "enthusiasm that local union leadership and local rank-and-file have shown in working with young people—exchanging ideas—and, in other ways, reaching out to a new generation." He said that is often overlooked until one is "actually engaged with labor" in a working relationship.

Kemble appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, where he was questioned by Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Murray Seeger, of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONLY TWO YEARS AGO there was deep and widespread concern over the desperate housing situation in this country.

The magnitude of the housing crisis was documented at that time by two groups—The President's Committee on Urban Housing and the National Commission on Urban Problems.

The first committee estimated that in 1968 "about 7.8 million American families—one in every eight—cannot now afford to pay the market price for standard housing that would cost no more than 20 percent of their total incomes."

In time the housing issue spilled over to Congress which enacted the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968. It was landmark legislation designed to initiate new programs to stimulate, by means of interest subsidies, a massive upsurge of home construction for moderate income housing.

A national housing goal for the next 10 years was set: 26 million dwelling units, 6 million for low- and moderate-income families. This meant 2.6 million homes a year.

In contrast, only 1,291,000 housing starts were recorded in 1967. The year the legislation was passed, 1,507,700 starts were recorded. However, after the Nixon Administration took over it has been pretty much down hill. In the latest report, for September, there were 1,396,000 starts on a seasonally adjusted basis.

Closely related to the very basic problem of shelter is jobs—and in construction, unemployment has reached frightening levels. In September 1970 it was 13.8 percent, up from 7.4 percent a year earlier.

WHAT IS PAINFULLY obvious is that not only will the goal of the 1968 Housing Act be unmet by 1978 but also that, with the new family formations and the loss of homes to demolition, condemnation and fire, the housing situation has been reduced to emergency status.

Almost every day the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development issues an analysis of housing demands for individual cities and without fail each tells the same story.

When we compare the rate of home building in this country with other countries, the picture looks even more dismal. Last year we built 7.69 housing units per 1,000 residents. During the same period, Sweden built 13.43 units per 1,000, Japan built 11.89, the Soviet Union built 9.80, the Netherlands 9.63 and France 8.23.

If mere words were action HUD Sec. George Romney would have met the crisis.

"In my view," he said a few months ago, "we face a full scale housing crisis. I consider it an emergency because of the important role housing plays in meeting the physical and social needs of people. After all, food, clothing and shelter—those are the three fundamentals."

Despite this strong statement by the nation's chief housing officer, the Administration has adopted a low-priority, business-as-usual policy toward housing.

Congress provided the President with anti-inflationary tools to spur homebuilding but he has chosen to ignore them. In signing the standby credit control bill the President made clear that he would not use its provisions, which permit him to roll back interest rates and to channel funds into housing credit needs.

The President vetoed the HUD appropriations bill, providing $18 billion for all the programs of HUD, National Aeronautics & Space Administration, Veterans Administration and independent offices.

The Administration's own housing bill offered nothing meaningful in terms of new programs or new money. It offered codification of all the many housing laws which, while needed, could perpetuate the shortcomings of the laws themselves.

Housing is too critical not to be top priority. If the lame duck session of this Congress does not take fundamental action the new Congress must or the nation, as a whole, will lose.

REGISTRATION of many thousands of low-income voters across the country was accomplished by young workers and students who volunteered in the Frontlash 70 campaign, Penn Kemble, center, tells reporters on Labor News Conference. Kemble was interviewed by Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

FTC Finally Cracking Down On Claims of 'Orange Drinks'

By Sidney Margolius

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION has moved to cut down the nutritional claims for the "orange drinks" that many moderate-income families buy as a beverage, including as a breakfast drink.

As we have pointed out many times, these "drinks" often are as much as 90 percent water and sometimes more. The big 46-ounce cans can mislead you into thinking you are getting a lot for your money. If you read the labels, you can see that the leading ingredients are water and sugar.

In the case of "Hi-C," the FTC has charged its manufacturer, the Coca Cola Co., with making false nutritional claims, and says that the name "Hi-C" itself is misleading. In fact, the FTC charges Hi-C is less nutritious even though often it is more expensive than real orange juice.

That's true enough. A survey we have just completed shows that while such "orange drinks" seem to cost no more than frozen or canned orange juice, actually they cost much more in terms of vitamin C content, let alone the other nutrients real orange juice provides. An ounce of the sugar-water drinks provides 5 milligrams of vitamin C (ascorbic acid) compared to about 12.5 per ounce of orange juice and about 11 for grapefruit juice.

Thus, it takes six ounces of Hi-C and most other drinks to provide the 30 milligrams of vitamin C considered to be the minimum daily requirement. You get this much in just 2.5 ounces of orange juice which costs less than half the price of the "drinks." The usual four-ounce serving of orange juice provides about 50 milligrams of vitamin C. This is nutritionally more desirable than the minimum 30, which is a desirable minimum only for children.

Hawaiian Punch is even weaker in vitamin C than the other "drinks." It takes eight ounces of this pat-on-the-wrist "punch" to provide 30 mgs. of vitamin C. In terms of this nutrient, Hawaiian Punch costs three to four times more than orange juice.

If the FTC charges against Hi-C stick, the Coca-Cola Co. still has its flank protected. It also makes two of the leading orange juice concentrates—Snow Crop and Minute Maid. But note the lower cost of the private-brand frozen concentrates. We shopped several regional chains selected at random. Most co-ops and supermarket chains in your own area also have their own private-brand juices. In fact, one company packs most of the frozen orange juice for the various chains under the chains' names.

THE SO-CALLED "instant breakfast drinks" are also questionable. These are really invented foods consisting mainly of sugar, flavorings, artificial color and added vitamin C, with one or two other added vitamins, plus fillers. Revealingly, Start, Tang and Awake are all made by General Foods.

So don't say there is no competition in the food business. Different divisions of General Foods compete against each other in advertising, invented product names, price and variations of the vitamins and flavorings they add to these synthetic beverages.

Start and Tang are powders. You add water. Awake has the silliest idea of all. It is a frozen concentrate of sugar syrup (water and sugar) with the added flavorings and synthetic vitamins.

The synthetic drinks are even cheaper in vitamin C than orange juice, but do not have all the other nutrients of the real juice. Synthetic vitamin C is cheap. We figure that a nine-ounce jar of Tang for 59 cents gives you about 10 cents worth of vitamin C plus a penny's worth of vitamin A. Thus you are paying $1.05 a pound for a product that is mostly sugar with flavorings and 11 cents worth of vitamins. Sugar is 13 cents a pound.

Nostalgia for Past Competing With Razzle-Dazzle of Present

By Jane Goodsell

SEEMS LIKE the world is moving backwards and forwards at the same time. The more futuristic we get, the more desperately we cling to the linsey-woolsey coziness of the past.

No sooner did psychedelic nightclubs and topless go-go dancers burst upon the scene, than along came a revival of the Victorian ice cream parlour featuring Gay Nineties decor, root beer floats, and straw-hatted waiters wearing striped aprons and handlebar moustaches.

The emergence of hard-edge pop, op and kinetic art was paralleled by a renaissance of art nouveau with its quaint curlicues and flowery embellishments. The beat of electronic hard rock is counterpointed by the syrupy melodies of Lawrence Welk and the earthy twang of country music.

We are fascinated by the new-fangled, yet we hanker wistfully after the old-fashioned. This makes for some pretty funny contrasts.

As for example: in my own bookcase, "Future Shock" nestles cozily beside a recently re-printed edition of the 1902 Sears Roebuck catalog; and "Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex" is only a few inches removed from "What Ever Happened to . . . . . ?", a nostalgic look-back at such outmoded antiquities as buckle galoshes, horsehair crinolines, T. L. compliments and the crippe.

Clearly I'm not the only member of the reading public who is beguiled by the present but hooked on the past. Right up there on the best-seller list, along with all those books on ultra-modern subjects like sex and women's liberation, is a book called "Hard Times" on the bygone days of the depression.

Or take movies. As modern films become ever more contemporary (wider screens, dazzling technical proficiency, explicit sex), so does the craze for old flicks pick up momentum. Even kids who went through the psychedelic experience of seeing "2001" five times, rate "The Bank Dick" (an old W. C. Fields film) as groovy.

Take interior decorating. The operative word nowadays is "eclectic" which means, roughly, a mixture of everything, and it sure is.

Plexiglas tables, tubular steel chairs and abstract prints mingle stylishly—if somewhat schizophrenically—with early American rockers and old copper wash boilers serving as wood baskets. With so many people coming down with nostalgia, the current demand for antiques far exceeds the supply and prices have soared.

It has also become a lifestyle. Many people nowadays bake their own bread, grind their own coffee, do crewel embroidery and make homemade ice cream in handcrank freezers.

What it more likely proves is that human beings can take just so much of plastic, computers, moonshots and complaints from Portnoy without feeling a desperate need to connect with something that seems to them more real than reality. And if they can find it by kneading yeast dough, browsing through a turn-of-the-century catalog, or hiding their heads under a patchwork quilt, why the dickens shouldn't they?

Isolated from Workplace:

Limited Goals Mar 'Women's Lib' Drive

THE WOMEN'S liberation movement, which has created such controversy in recent months, is not a new phenomenon but part of a long struggle for women's equality, Bayard Rustin writes.

The fact that a major feminist demonstration was held on Aug. 26, 1970 is indicative of the historical character of this movement since the date was the 50th anniversary of the passage of the 19th Amendment granting female suffrage, the executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute says. He continues:

"The modern feminist movement differs from the suffragette movement of a half century ago in that its demands have more to do with economic equality than political rights. To a considerable degree, this is a reflection of technological changes that have taken place in the society which have freed the more affluent women from household chores and have enabled them to gain a high degree of education. They are now demanding that jobs and other opportunities be opened to them on a non-discriminatory basis. The force of their argument is reflected in economic statistics which show that the income differential between men and women is greater than it is between whites and blacks.

"If the women's liberation movement should be criticized, it is not because their demands are unjust. What is wrong with these demands is that they don't go far enough. They are inadequate in that they are proposed in isolation from the broad social and economic context of American life. The feminists are making the same mistake that many other social protesters have made: that is, they do not connect their demands with larger issues which ultimately will determine whether the specific demands can be met.

"It is not enough to have day care centers that will free the mother from the children. There should also be the demand for the expansion of pre-school education and for quality integrated schools that will liberate the minds of the children and enable them to develop themselves to their fullest potential.

"The demand for equal employment opportunities cannot be met in the absence of full employment. As long as a sizable portion of the population is out of work, workers, regardless of their sex or race, will have to compete for jobs, and employers will be able to hire those willing to work for least pay. It should be added in this context that the demand for female equality is too often stated in terms of giving women the same rights as men. What happens is that women then consider their own privileges—such as laws protecting women workers—to be expendable.

"Rather than giving up these rights, they should be demanding that similar privileges be granted to all workers.

"The failure to date of the women's liberation movement to make their demands within this larger context is not accidental. It is, in fact, a commentary on the affluent social origins of many of the feminists. They are, for the most part, women who already have access to adequate health care, whose children (if they have them) probably attend excellent schools, and who don't need jobs but better jobs. This is one of the reasons why so few black women have participated in the feminist movement.

"If the feminists do not make the larger demands I have suggested, their movement will become just another middle class foray into limited social reform, the main result of which will be to divert valuable social energies away from the problem of fundamentally transforming our society's institutions. And without such a transformation leading to full social equality, all Americans—female or male, black or white, poor and rich—will not be free."

Dilemma for Parents:

Aid Needed to Solve College Cost Crisis

New York—A greater federal investment is essential to solving the mounting cost crisis in education, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis told the College Entrance Examination Board.

Davis, in a luncheon speech at the board's national conference here, said that "union members who have come to take it for granted that their children should go to college are now having to ask themselves whether they can bear the financial burden."

He made these points in outlining the problem:

- Tuition and required fees, on the average, have more than doubled in the last ten years.
- Federal funds and private contributions to higher education have both diminished.
- Increasing unemployment makes it extremely difficult for students to find summer jobs.

At least part of the answer to the dilemma facing parents, he stressed, must be provided by increased federal funding for education. "It will take a great deal of money, but it is money invested, not money spent," Davis declared.

Citing the enormous benefit to the United States from the GI educational program as an example, Davis asserted that "tax support of higher education ultimately costs the public nothing." In fact, he observed, because of higher earnings flowing from their education, veterans have more than repaid the government through the resulting higher income tax payments. And the entire system has benefitted from the 2.2 million veterans who became engineers, doctors, teachers, electricians and professionals in all fields.

The AFL-CIO, Davis pointed out, has consistently urged Congress to provide full funds for current higher educational programs and has given strong support in the state legislatures to the budgets of state colleges and universities.

He stressed, however, that the federation opposes the plan to give tax credits to parents to offset college tuition payments. This plan, said Davis, would lead to higher tuition and offer no benefit to low-income families, students working their way through college, or veterans under the GI bill.

Davis underscored organized labor's position that higher education should be available to all persons to the limit of their ability without "mortgaging their future earnings."

Opposed to this view, he noted, is "a strong train of thought which would predetermine, on the basis of background, income and other factors, who would benefit from a college education and who would not."

"There is no question in our minds," he continued, "that there are some individuals of influence in our society who would restrict higher education to the elite, for the most part, while all others would pursue a vocational educational program."

Davis voiced sharp disagreement with Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew's position that college and universities should close their doors to all but those students who have demonstrated superior intellectual qualifications. Agnew's view, Davis suggested, is based on the false assumption that society has given every citizen an equal opportunity to demonstrate his intellectual qualifications.

The high premium on college and graduate degrees makes it difficult to persuade young people to enter vocational schools, Davis said. He emphasized the need to train people in skilled crafts and service industries, but insisted that first the status of these careers must be upgraded.

BUILDING TRADES CRAFTSMEN presented their views on such topics as Viet Nam, students and civil disorder before 300 students at Hamline University in St. Paul, Minn. The three workers were invited by the students to take part in the forum, aimed at promoting better understanding between workers and the campus community. Seated from left are Gary Carr, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 455; Tom Szalapski, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 110, and Joe Vincent, Carpenters Local 1644. They are members of the construction crews building a new library at the university. Hamline Prof. Richard Benjamin, right, introduced the speakers.

Bakers Ask Consumers To Shun Struck Firms

The Bakery & Confectionery Workers have turned to consumers for aid in their battle for adequate contract terms with two big Maryland baking firms.

Backed by three other unions, the bakers urged consumers not to buy baked goods produced by strikebreakers at plants of the Stroehmann Bros. Baking Co. and Schmidt's Baking Co.

The don't-buy campaign was launched at a meeting of union officers, field representatives, and delegates from the Meat Cutters, Retail Clerks and Teamsters.

The campaign resulted, the B&C said, from the attempt of the Stroehmann firm "to force an impossible settlement down the throats of workers" at its Cumberland plant. The posture of the company, it said, is "in line with its traditionally militant antiunion position."

Stroehmann recently bought Ort's Baking Co. in Cumberland, where employes had enjoyed 30 years of union-management peace. The workers walked out in July, and Schmidt Baking followed the lead of its Cumberland competitor in forcing a strike also.

Stroehmann operates nine plants —seven in Pennsylvania, one in New York and the plant in Cumberland. Schmidt Baking has plants only in Baltimore and Cumberland.

Schmidt bakers in Baltimore struck after several tries at forming a union. Demanding union recognition, they stayed out.

A campaign to bring unorganized workers of both firms into the labor movement is under way. The don't-buy campaign covers all of Pennsylvania, a great part of New York state, southern New Jersey, Maryland, including Greater Washington, and portions of Virginia and West Virginia.

The union said that among those fired for refusing to cross a union picket line at the Stroehmann Bakery in Williamsport, Pa., was a 65-year old worker who needs one more year of service to win a pension, and a widow, the sole support of her family, who worked 28 years at the Williamsport plant.

Business Executives Hit by Unemployment

New York—Even business executives are being hit by the current wave of unemployment.

A study made by the Council of Better Business Bureaus reports that some 390,000 executives are looking for jobs, many of them in "a state of shock."

The council said it is planning a booklet cautioning job-hunting executives against being victimized by high-priced "job counselors."

Indiana Labor Maps Program Of Legislation

Indianapolis—A state legislative program that proposes collective bargaining rights for public employes, improvements in jobless benefits and workmen's compensation was adopted by the seventh biennial convention of the Indiana AFL-CIO.

The 800 delegates to the three-day convention also called for repeal of the state's 2 percent consumer tax in favor of a graduated income tax structure.

Besides increased payments for unemployed workers, the proposal urges coverage for all workers and dependents. Training of displaced workers and extension of jobless benefits for workers on strike more than six weeks are included in the program.

The convention also backed resolutions calling on Congress to increase social security benefits, improve vocational education programs, establish a national health insurance system and boost the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour.

Pres. Willis N. Zagrovich and Sec.-Treas. Max F. Wright were re-elected to new two-year terms. Two new members were elected to the executive board: Domenic Ala of the Clothing Workers and Joseph Bradley of the Boilermakers.

Speakers at the convention included Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, national COPE Dir. Al Barkan, Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.).

New Pamphlet Aids Health Plan Drive

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet as part of the federation's campaign for national health insurance is now available.

"National Health Insurance —Labor's No. 1 Goal" is a 12-page publication based on a radio address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany spelling out the crisis in national health care and the legislative cure through a national health insurance plan.

Copies of the pamphlet are available without cost in reasonable quantities from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Cheating on Wage Law Hits Low-Paid Hardest

A new government study shows that nearly nine of every 10 workers illegally underpaid by their employers are in the lowest income groups, Administrator Robert D. Moran of the wage-hour division of the Labor Dept. told employers at a meeting in Agawam, Mass.

Moran announced to the Employers Association of Western Massachusetts that his division has devised a new system of reporting to determine what workers need help the most.

He hailed as "extremely gratifying" a report showing that for the three-month period ending Sept. 30, "our investigations disclosed approximately $27.5 million owed to 124,000 employes as the result of violations of laws enforced by the wage-hour division."

Moran said the report shows that 44 percent of the underpaid workers earn less than $1.60 an hour and 42 percent earn between that and the Bureau of Labor Statistics lower family income figure ($5,700 a year to $7,300 for a family of four).

"In other words, 86 percent of the back wages owed to employes because of statutory violations disclosed by wage-hour compliance officers . . . was owed to people who have become known as the working poor," Moran said.

He said he has discovered that the lowest-paid workers have not been receiving first priority in investigations of minimum pay violations under the wage-hour law, the Davis-Bacon public contracts law, and the equal-pay law covering woman workers.

Instead of using wage underpayments in dollar amounts as a yardstick to use in measuring the performance of districts, Moran wants his directors to help him improve service to the lowest-paid workers.

At Agawam he disclosed also that his new data reveal that nearly 99 percent of the $3 million in payments below the minimums in the Equal Pay law are owed to women earning less than the amount needed to support a family of four.

Rudolph Oswald, an AFL-CIO economist who specializes in wage-hour matters, says Moran's latest report underscores the continuing shortage of compliance officers to enforce the laws listed by Moran.

Unless underpayments are recovered the laws "mean nothing," said Oswald. Not much more than a third of the money withheld by cheating or careless employers ever is recovered, his figures show.

Oswald said Moran's new data also show that minimum wage law violations continue not only as to underpayments of the minimums but also because of employers' failure to pay overtime required by law.

In many cases, he declared, workers paid slightly more than the minimum are being denied overtime pay, although they work overtime and should be paid for such work.

Violations of the Equal Pay Law, he said, tend to pull down the wages of women workers in general because of discrimination against some workers solely because they are women.

N.H. Delegates Urge Passage Of Safety Bill

Shelburne, N.H.—Delegates to the New Hampshire State AFL-CIO convention here termed occupational safety and health legislation "vital" to America's workers and urged Congress to complete action on it this year.

"The need for federal action is clear," the convention said, because "the states have abdicated their responsibility."

Other major resolutions approved by the delegates urged a $2.50 an hour minimum wage, proposed dependents' allowances in state unemployment and workmen's compensation programs, called for quotas on textile and shoe imports, and asked strong action to clean up polluted air and water.

The convention warned against permitting race to divide working people. It called for strict enforcement of civil rights laws coupled with "massive planning and social investment to make possible the development of new jobs and new housing for all workers."

The convention gave its Toland Award for the person who has contributed most to the improvement of labor-management relationships to Richard P. Flynn, president of Bookbinders Local 33 and a past president of the state central body.

THE THREAT TO JOBS posed by unlimited imports of electric, electronic and optical products is explained in leaflets being distributed in front of Macy's store in New York City by members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The campaign, under the banner of "Fair International Trade and Employment" calls for limitations on job-destroying imports, fair international labor standards to protect workers all over the world from exploitation, orderly expansion of world trade and regulation of multinational corporations.

Firm Still Defies Law:

11th NLRB Order Hits J. P. Stevens

A three-member panel of the National Labor Relations Board ruled that J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., failed to bargain in good faith with the Textile Workers Union of America when it arbitrarily changed the wage-payment system at its Gulistan plant in Statesboro, Ga.

It was the 11th consecutive NLRB finding of violations of the federal labor law by Stevens, the nation's second largest textile firm and a big government contractor.

Board Chairman Edward B. Miller and Members Gerald A. Brown and Howard Jenkins, Jr. upheld a trial examiner's finding that plant management illegally changed the wage system at Gulistan not long after the union was certified as the workers' bargaining agent.

The board ordered Stevens to restore the former wage structure, compensate employes for any lost pay, bargain with the union on wages, hours and other conditions and, if an agreement is reached, put it into written form.

The TWUA had charged that the switch from incentive pay to a flat rate system 16 months ago was in retaliation for the workers' vote for the union in an NLRB election.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said of the latest board decision: "Even the most conservative and business-oriented view of the National Labor Relations Act cannot be stretched far enough to encompass the anti-labor policies of J. P. Stevens. . . .

"At this stage of the company's history of anti-labor activity one can only marvel at the patience of the law enforcement branch of the federal government, contemplate with awe its sanctimonious posture of concern about violations of the law, and ask again, 'How long, O Lord, how long?' "

NLRB records show that Stevens has in a decade of legal battling managed to avoid bargaining with any union despite the law and numerous court rulings.

In the Statesboro case, the corporation's defense is that Stevens has no duty to bargain with the union until a U.S. Court of Appeals makes a final ruling. It argues that an NLRB order is of no effect until a court so states, and therefore, to proceed on a case not yet settled by the courts would be to deny the corporation due process of law.

The board has asked the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans to enforce a previous order issued against Stevens in 1969 to bargain with the TWUA for its Gulistan plant employes. Stevens destroyed the union's majority at that time by a "campaign of extensive and egregious unfair practices to thwart the union's organizing drive at the Gulistan plant," the board ruled.

Stevens committed its 11th violation of the law by failing to observe this order when it changed the wage system, the latest ruling says. The order was in line with the board's so-called Gissel rule that an employer may be directed to recognize a union whose majority it has illegally destroyed.

Alabama Unions Plan Low-Cost Housing Units

Tuscaloosa—The Alabama AFL-CIO has received federal approval for the drawing of initial plans to build low-income-family housing in Birmingham, Florence and Decatur, council officers reported at the eighth biennial convention of the state central body.

That means the start of preliminary work on 800 housing units to be built with federal loans costing $11 million, Pres. Barney Weeks advised 550 delegates from the state's affiliated unions. Eventually the state council hopes to sponsor low-cost housing in every Alabama city where union members are concentrated, Weeks said.

The convention gave Weeks and Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell new two-year terms, and authorized the executive board to proceed with its housing program.

Weeks reported a membership gain of 15,000 since the 1968 convention and noted the success of a state-wide prescription drug program launched by the state body. Since its start 18 months ago, more than 32 stores have signed contracts to furnish members of affiliated unions with needed medicines at actual cost plus what Weeks called "a small professional fee."

Members of AFL-CIO unions are saving more than $500,000 a year on drugs because of the program, Weeks estimated.

Among convention speakers were Gov. Albert P. Brewer (D), whose term in office expires Jan. 15; Chief Justice-elect Howell Heflin of the Alabama Supreme Court; Bill Baxley of Dothan, attorney general-elect; Jerry Beasley, lieutenant-governor - elect; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO central bodies' coordinator, and Irma Angevine, executive director of the Consumers Federation of America.

The incoming state officials assured the delegates that labor and the consumer will get fair treatment when they assume office next January.

The convention called on the state attorney general to set up a consumer protection department, and Baxley promised the delegates he would do just that early in his new term of office.

Heflin pledged that labor will get a fair hearing in the state's top court, and Beasley announced that legislation of interest to labor will be referred to fair committees in the next session of the legislature.

The convention adopted a policy statement calling for a state minimum wage of $1.60 an hour. On the federal level, it voted to back the AFL-CIO drive for national health insurance and an occupational health and safety law.

Georgia Labor Asks Improved Minimum Pay

Augusta, Ga. — The Georgia State AFL-CIO laid the groundwork at its 14th annual convention for an all-out drive to boost the state minimum wage to $1.50 an hour.

The 650 delegates also called on the state legislature to extend coverage of the wage law to more workers. Through labor's efforts, the legislature earlier this year adopted the state's first minimum wage law setting a floor of $1.25 an hour for covered workers.

Delegates voted to increase monthly per capita payments from 10 cents to 12 cents. The additional income will be channelled mainly into COPE operations and legislative programs of the state body.

Pres. J. O. Moore told the convention that 8,000 new members were enrolled in the state body since the last convention to boost the total membership to 74,000 members.

Moore was re-elected to his second two-year term as president, defeating former Sec. J. W. Giles. In the contest for secretary, H. H. Marbry of the Carpenters was elected over Melvin Tate of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers. Mrs. Louise Dean was re-elected treasurer.

Speakers at the three-day convention included Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery and Georgia Commissioner of Labor Sam Caldwell.

Times, News Reach Pacts With Guild

New York—Wage increases as high as $100 a week are provided in new three-year contracts tentatively agreed upon by the Newspaper Guild and the New York Times and the Daily News.

Guild negotiators reached agreement a few hours before a scheduled walkout and sent the terms to a vote Nov. 9 by 2,600 Guildsmen at the Times and about 1,400 at the News.

No details were released pending unit votes, but a Guild spokesman said the papers offered the same 41.69 percent package increase won by the Guild at the Post, and by other unions from the publishers.

Under the pattern formula, top minimum wages for experienced reporters, copy editors and advertising salesmen will rise at the Times from $255.25 to $361.66 a week in the third year and at the News from $242.55 to $343.67.

Guild members have been working under a contract extension since Mar. 30. Besides wages, which will go up in yearly increments of 15, 11 and 11 percent, issues at the two dailies include a full union shop, percentage increases applied to top minimums in all Guild classifications, conversion of a six-minute reduction in working time per day to cash or other benefits, and improved pensions.

Theodore W. Kheel, chief mediator in the talks that started last February, said contract approval by members of the Guild and the photoengravers would close out the 1970 round of negotiations. Kheel was aided by federal and state mediators.

Eugene Goslee Named Labor Board Solicitor

The appointment of Eugene G. Goslee as solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board was announced by NLRB Chairman Edward B. Miller. Goslee, 48, is a veteran NLRB attorney.

Goslee succeeds William Feldesman, now on leave for an assignment on behalf of the International Labor Organization in Africa. On his return, Feldesman will become a special assistant to Board Member John H. Fanning.

Court Asked to Outlaw Housing Barrier to Poor

The AFL-CIO has joined with the National Urban Coalition and 14 other organizations in asking the Supreme Court to overturn a section of the California state constitution that requires referendum approval by the voters before a low-income public housing project can be built in a community.

A three-judge federal district court unanimously found the state requirement to be discriminatory, and the cooperating organizations have asked the Supreme Court to sustain that finding.

The brief submitted by the 16 organizations termed the referendum requirement "loaded dice" since it applies only to housing for the poor and has the effect of fencing them out of areas where employment is expanding and segregating them in depressed inner city areas.

Cities and counties, through equitably-applied zoning laws and building codes, can set appropriate standards for housing, the brief noted. But to require that only housing developments for low-income families pass the additional hurdle of voter ratification is clearly discriminatory, the organizations stressed.

The brief said the requirement is "precisely analogous" to a law that would allow an unlimited number of peremptory challenges against black or poor jurors, while providing that other prospective jurors could be challenged only for cause.

Also stressed in the brief was the inequity of a situation wherein one type of federal subsidy—to help provide adequate housing for people with low incomes—is made subject to local referendum approval, "while subsidies for those with higher incomes flow unhampered by the need to obtain public approval of the subsidy."

Among the organizations joining in the brief were civil rights groups such as the NAACP, the National Urban League and the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing, the Alliance for Labor Action, and industry groups including the National Association of Home Builders.

IUE Membership Ratifies Dues Hike

All 10 constitutional amendments approved earlier this year by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers convention were ratified in local referendums.

Trustees of the IUE said the issues were ratified by wide margins. The closest votes were about 4 to 1 on four of the amendments.

All amendments go into effect next Jan. 1.

They provide, among other things, for an increase in minimum monthly dues from $5 to $6 in steps over a four-year period and 25 cents more every two years thereafter, mandatory retirement of officers and staff members at age 65, and the establishment of procedures for calling and conducting special conventions.

Video Tape No Substitute:

GE Told to Permit On-Spot Job Study

Video tapes of work performed at a General Electric Co. plant in Dover, O., are not a reasonable substitute for on-the-job inspection of the work by the union representing the workers, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

The decision upheld a refusal-to-bargain charge brought by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers against GE in May 1969. The IUE charged that the company refused to let a union expert into the plant to observe two disputed jobs and to advise IUE Local 705 whether it had grounds for processing a grievance.

Union members initiated the grievance, charging that pay rates were too low on jobs whose grades had been reduced. One was a grinding job, the other that of a set-up punch press operator in the Dover fabrication department, where IUE members make wire for electric lamps and electronic parts.

NLRB Trial Examiner Harold X. Summers heard witnesses and ruled that while unions do not have an automatic right to make in-plant studies, in this case there was no alternative. He said video tapes offered by GE were subject to misinterpretation and were inferior to on-the-job inspection.

Board members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown agreed with Summers and ordered GE to permit the inspection. Chairman Edward B. Miller dissented, saying he would have dimissed the charge.

After the union filed its grievance at Dover, an IUE representative asked permission to come into the plant to evaluate the two jobs. The GE community relations supervisor at Dover said it was against company policy to let "outsiders" into the plant. When he offered the use of video-tape recordings of the jobs, the union said it could not intelligently process a grievance without actually seeing the work performed.

The examiner agreed with the union. The test of all similar union requests, Summers wrote, is whether the action proposed "is the only reliable and reasonably expeditious device for accomplishing an objective of the labor act—making it possible for a bargaining representative intelligently to process a grievance."

Summers concluded that at Dover, no local union officials were qualified to decide whether the grievance was reasonable or unreasonable. He said it was necessary that the evaluation be made by someone who was qualified—and the IUE representative was such a person.

Video tapes, he concluded, were not a good substitute because "opportunity abounds" for the camera to be "selectively deficient, by design or otherwise," and a tape, however skillfully produced, must omit "much of the contextual surroundings in which the job is performed."

Summers gave this clinching argument: GE set the rates on the two jobs in the first place through visual inspection by more than one trained observer, not by tapes. In his opinion, the in-plant evaluation was necessary.

GE previously had lost several other disputes with IUE over time-studies and in-plant inspection. Cited as precedent in the latest ruling were two recent cases in GE plants at Hickory, N.C., and Youngstown, O.

Meany Mourns Cardinal Cushing

Richard Cardinal Cushing, who died at 75, was "a true friend of workers and their unions and a real humanitarian," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to Catholics of the Boston archdiocese.

Meany expressed "deep sadness" on hearing of the death of the churchman, who died of cancer after retiring two months ago as archbishop of Boston. Meany's message said: "Please extend to the priests and people of the Archdiocese of Boston the sincere condolences of the AFL-CIO and my personal deep regrets."

The cardinal gave up his post after 26 years to Archbishop Humberto S. Medeiros, named by Pope Paul VI to succeed him. He was to be buried Nov. 7 after a funeral mass in Holy Cross Cathedral, Boston.

GREAT DAY for New Haven labor came at groundbreaking for $2 million health care center under enabling legislation fought for successfully by labor with wide community support against opposition of state medical society. Speakers, top photo, included Mayor B. G. Guida, standing on wood pile, and to the right of the mayor, Pres. Vincent J. Sirabella of New Haven AFL-CIO. The center, shown below in architect's drawing will give member families comprehensive health and hospital care on a prepaid basis in cooperation with nearby Yale University-New Haven Medical Center.

Unionists Study Impact Of Switch to Metrics

Individual workers should not be compelled to bear the burden of the nation's conversion to the metric system of measurement, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger stressed at a study conference of union representatives.

Although recognizing the eventual benefits to business and world trade, Goldfinger emphasized that increased use of the metric system is not just a matter of conversion tables, but a human problem, involving a change in education and thinking. It is essential, he said, that there be enough time for the necessary adjustment process.

While the AFL-CIO has not taken a policy stand on this issue, Goldfinger said consideration is being given to the problems involved in conversion. Chief among them, he said, is the need for retraining and re-education for the entire work force so that upgrading and eligibility for different jobs do not become a problem.

Other potential problems involve the cost of tools, which would have to be altered or replaced, collective bargaining contracts in cases of wage incentives based on current methods of measurement, and blueprint reading.

The conference, one of several being held by the Bureau of Standards, provided an opportunity for representatives of labor to discuss the problems and advantages of increasing worldwide use of the metric system.

Other labor representatives at the conference were Chic St. Croix of the Oil Workers, Graham McKelvey of the Mine Workers, Thomas Hannigan of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, John Weiser of the Textile Workers Union of America, Bert Gottlieb and Robert Franco of the Transportation Institute, John Turner of the Auto Workers, and William Cotton of the Air Line Pilots.

Florida Unions Seek Alliance With Colleges

Hollywood, Fla.—Full cooperation with universities and colleges in the operation of labor studies programs was stressed at the 14th annual convention of the Florida AFL-CIO.

The 400 delegates to the three-day convention called on unions throughout the state to assist educators in setting up such programs.

Tentative steps already have been taken by several local unions in the Miami area for operation of studies centers in union halls in cooperation with the new Florida International University.

In an address to the delegates, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers called for increased emphasis on union participation in community services activities. Beirne told the delegates that deeper involvement in these activities, would not only benefit union members and the community, but would also enhance the overall image of labor.

A net gain of 8,000 members over the past year, boosting the total membership of the state labor body to about 85,000 was reported by state AFL-CIO Pres. Charlie Harris. The increase came despite a loss of a number of members through the disaffiliation of the Chemical Workers, Harris pointed out.

Delegates drafted proposals for legislative programs keyed to curbing air and water pollution on both the state and national levels. The convention also called for an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour, passage of the occupational health and safety bill now before Congress and passage of other labor-supported legislative measures.

New Haven Health Plan Earns Praise for Labor

New Haven—Organized labor deserves the thanks of the people of Connecticut for spearheading a drive for the state's first community-sponsored prepaid health care plan, Mayor B. F. Guida said at groundbreaking ceremonies for a $2 million health care center.

New Haven AFL-CIO Pres. Vincent J. Sirabella said the success of the plan will determine whether other centers can be built in the state.

Sirabella told how the Yale Medical Center and the Yale-New Haven Hospital played a key part in early negotiations that led to an agreement of affiliation to provide hospital and medical care for plan subscribers and their families.

The center, a $1 million structure, will open next summer after installation of facilities and equipment costing another $1 million. The two-story building was designed to provide members with comprehensive health care "through one door," said Sirabella, who is chairman of the board of directors of the plan.

The plan will give enrollees and their families comprehensive health care services on a pre-paid basis, along lines favored by most labor groups, in cooperation with the medical center. Services will include preventive, diagnostic and treatment care in the health center; hospitalization when needed, and all physician and supporting services at home and in the hospital, as well as at the health center.

The city and state central labor bodies launched the health care program in 1967, got the state legislature to pass enabling legislation against the opposition of the state medical society, and won support from the university, business and civic community.

The plan's board includes Mrs. Ruth W. Greenberg, former education director for the State AFL-CIO, as secretary and treasurer, and these unionists as directors: Pres. John J. Driscoll of the State AFL-CIO, Dominic Furco of the Typographical Union, Dominic Panagrossi of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Lawrence N. Spitz, assistant to Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Harry Kaplan of the United Electrical Workers, Stanley Rogers of the Auto Workers and John D. Sansone of the Teamsters.

Six Seminars Slated for CSA Liaison Staff

Six on-the-job training seminars for more than 185 full-time AFL-CIO Community Services representatives from 135 industrial communities are scheduled for next February and March.

Leo Perlis, director of Community Services Activities for the federation, announced that the seminars will be coordinated by William A. Davies, AFL-CIO-CSA national representative with United Community Funds & Councils of America. They will be held in cooperation with three universities.

The schedule:

Feb. 7-12, University of California, Berkeley.

Feb. 14-19, University of Houston, Houston.

March 7-12, University of Miami, Coral Gables.

March 14-19, University of Miami, Coral Gables.

On March 21-26, two separate classes will run concurrently at the University of Miami, Coral Gables.

Liberal Gains Rebuff Administration

Meany Cites Voter Repudiation Of Agnew 'Fear, Smear' Tactics

John V. Tunney ousted Sen. George Murphy in California and Adlai Stevenson III defeated interim appointee Ralph T. Smith in Illinois.

One Senate race remained in doubt pending the counting of absentee ballots. In a direct liberal-conservative confrontation, Sen. Vance Hartke of Indiana held a slim lead over Republican Rep. Richard L. Roudebush.

Final result of the Rhode Island governorship also hinged on absentee ballots as did the last cliff-hanger among the House races in Kentucky, with Democratic challenger Romano L. Mazzoli holding a slim lead over conservative Rep. William O. Cowger.

In his post-election comments, Nixon and Republican Party officials expressed public satisfaction over the results. The President claimed that he now has a working ideological majority in the Senate, but Democratic leaders disputed his view.

GOP spokesmen also argued that the results reversed the historic tradition that the party holding the White House usually suffers heavy congressional losses at mid-term.

But all of the factors that make up that tradition were not present in the 1970 election. Nixon, for one thing, was the first President since 1848 to take office while the opposition party retained control of Congress. Thus, there was little room this year for the usual fallout of congressmen who rode the President's coat-tails into office.

This year, in fact, it was the Democrats who were most vulnerable, especially in the Senate. They held 25 of the 35 Senate seats up in 1970 against only 10 for the Republicans. And they took 23 of the contests, counting Hartke and Sen. Harry F. Byrd of Virginia, who ran as an independent this time but announced he would vote with the Democrats to organize the Senate. In the 1972 election, the Democrats will have the numerical advantage. Only 14 of the party's Senate seats will be at stake then against 19 for the Republicans.

The election produced no clear evidence of the much-heralded "conservative trend" among the electorate. While Gore was suffering defeat to conservative Rep. William E. Brock III in Tennessee, further to the south in Florida, equally conservative Rep. William Cramer lost out to a labor-backed newcomer, Lawton Chiles. While the liberal Tydings was losing in Maryland, the liberal Tunney was winning in California.

And in New York, where the winning Senate candidate, James L. Buckley, actually bore the Conservative Party label, he did not win a majority over his two liberal opponents. Democrat Richard L. Ottinger and the incumbent Republican, Charles Goodell.

Nixon was counting Buckley as an ideological gain, however, and Goodell was the victim of an Administration purge led by Agnew.

Meany called the New York senatorial results "a disgrace" and said the Administration's claim to victory there, "achieved by cutting the political throat of a member of the President's own party, is somewhat grotesque."

The Administration's performance in New York can only produce strained relations with other liberal Republican senators, a number of whom campaigned on Goodell's behalf in an effort to counter Agnew's denunciations of his own party's candidate and his obvious preference for Buckley.

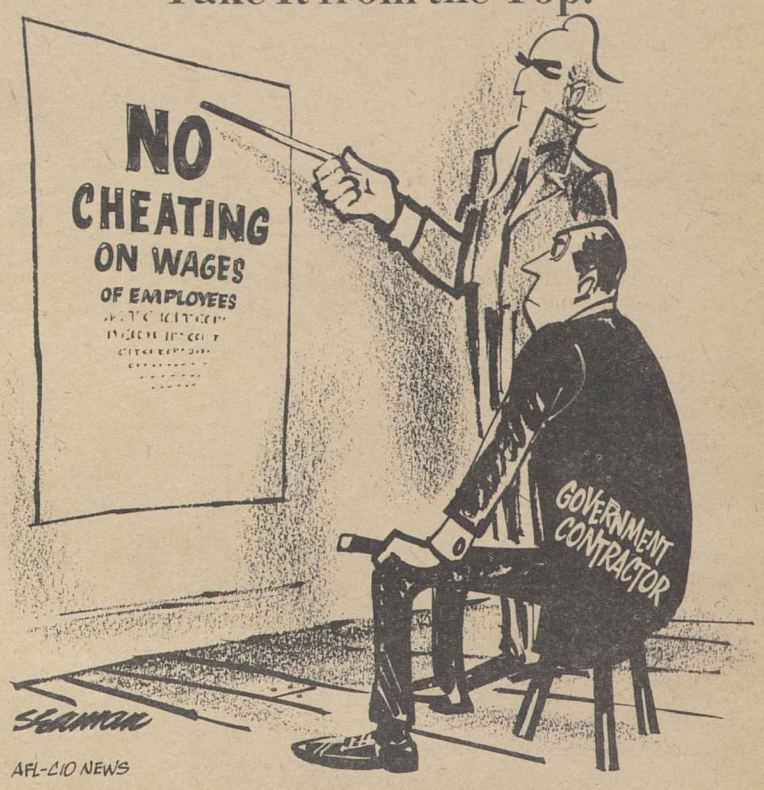
Nixon and Agnew's campaign tactics also left a strong residue of bitterness among victorious Democratic senators whom the GOP had targeted for defeat. Many of the very senators the Administration had attempted to equate with violence, campus disorders and narcotics peddling—the "radical liberals" as Agnew labelled them—will be back in office throughout the final two years of Nixon's term.

The rejection by the voters of the "law and order" campaign theme, drummed steadily by Republican leaders while they ignored pressing economic issues, also damages the President's reputation as a campaigner raising new questions as to his credibility and his standing with the public.



Another big factor in 1972 will be the Democratic Party's gain of governorships, giving it 29 of the 50 against only 18 before the election. The new Democratic governors will play a significant role in choosing their party's presidential candidate and their victories are a sign that the party's rebuilding efforts on the state level are bearing fruit.

The gains in the states also extended into the legislatures, which will have the task of drawing up new congressional districts based on the 1970 census, thus influencing the makeup of Congress for the next decade. The Democrats captured outright control of the legislatures in such important states as California and Pennsylvania, gained one house in a number of states including Wisconsin and Utah, and narrowed the Republican majority in still others.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in a speech the day after the election, called the switch of state houses "a major, major triumph which puts us in a better position for 1972 and its importance cannot be overstated."

Kirkland said the election was a victory for the labor movement because it was a vindication of labor's stand on "the really vital issues that concern people—not cops and robbers or permissiveness, whatever the hell that is—or even the war, but the critical condition of the economy, the need for jobs and for income to meet the whole range of problems that hits in the pocketbook, the advance to a better life."

Rocky Mountain States Produce for Democrats

Democrats in the Rocky Mountain States wrestled three state houses and three congressional seats from the Republicans while returning all five incumbent senators to office. But two congressional districts considered to be safely in the Democratic column before the elections were lost to the GOP.

Of the six gubernatorial contests—all held by Republicans—in the eight-state area, Democrats won in Nevada, New Mexico and Idaho. Voters returned GOP incumbents in Arizona, Colorado and Wyoming.

Congressional districts switching over to the Democratic column were in Utah, Wyoming, and New Mexico. Republicans, however, took over House seats formerly held by Democrats in Montana and Colorado.

With a net gain of one, the Democrats have improved their standing in the House but Republicans still hold a 9 to 8 edge.

Here is a state-by-state rundown:

Montana—Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield was re-elected to a fourth term by a wide margin over Republican challenger Harold Wallace. But Democratic incumbent Arnold Olsen, who was not expected to have serious opposition in Missoula Mayor Richard Shoup, lost to the Republican in a cliff-hanger.

Idaho—Liberal Democratic candidate Cecil Andrus knocked off Republican Gov. Don Samuelson by more than 10,000 votes. Andrus had failed in his bid for governor in 1966.

New Mexico—Bruce King, Democratic speaker of the state house of representatives for the past six years, defeated Republican Pete V. Domenici for the gubernatorial seat held by outgoing Republican Gov. David F. Cargo. Democratic Sen. Joseph M. Montoya won over the serious challenge of Republican Anderson Carter. State Sen. Harold L. Runnels upset conservative Republican incumbent Rep. Ed Foreman in the southwest congressional district.

Utah—Democratic Sen. Frank E. Moss won re-election handily over Republican Rep. Laurence J. Burton in what was expected to be a closely contested race. Democrat K. Gunn McKay was elected to the seat held by Burton in defeating Richard Richards, a former Republican state chairman.

Colorado—Republican Gov. John A. Love was elected to a third term over Democratic Lt. Gov. Mark Hogan. Republicans picked up an additional congressional seat as Denver District Atty. Mc-

Kevitt defeated Democratic candidate Craig S. Barnes.

Nevada — Sen. Howard W. Cannon was re-elected by a three-to-two margin in what was expected to be a serious challenge from Republican William Raggio. Liberal Democratic candidate Mike O'Callaghan defeated Ed Fike for the governorship for the seat being vacated by incumbent Republican Paul Laxalt.

Arizona—Republicans appeared to have lost a little strength, but not enough to block the re-election of Sen. Paul J. Fannin and Gov. John R. Williams. Democratic gubernatorial candidate Raul H. Castro ran somewhat stronger than running mate Sam Grossman in the Senate race.

Wyoming — A Democrat took over the lone congressional seat held by Republican Rep. John S. Wold, who lost in his effort to unseat Democratic Sen. Gale W. McGee. Former Democratic Rep. Teno Roncalio was successful in his comeback bid over the stiff opposition of Harry Roberts, the state superintendent of instruction.

COPE Choices Post .610 Winning Average

COPE-endorsed candidates had a .610 batting average in the 1970 elections, the best record since the 1964 liberal sweep.

Counting all the endorsed candidates for the 92nd Congress and the governorships, COPE chalked up a 60.4 percent victory margin; if undecided contests go to those currently leading the percentage would climb to 61.7.

In 1968 COPE-endorsed candidates won 56.4 percent of the contests. In 1966 the figure was 53 percent and in 1964 it reached a record high of 67 percent.

The 1970 figure will match the 62 percent chalked up in 1962.

COPE organizations at the state and local levels endorsed 336 candidates for the House of Representatives of whom 203 won, with one contest undecided. In the Senate 31 candidates were endorsed and 18 won, with one contest undecided.

In the governorships 29 were endorsed and 18 were victorious with the resurns still out in one contest.

COPE endorsements are made at the state and congressional district levels by state AFL-CIO groups. The endorsements are based primarily on the records or the espoused programs of the candidates in terms of a wide number of economic, welfare and labor issues.

A STAUNCH FRIEND of America's workers, Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), will be missing from the 92nd Congress. And the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council held a thank-you luncheon for the senator. Clyde M. Webber, executive vice president of the American Federation of Government Employes adds his name to a multi-union tribute. AFGE Pres. John F. Griner, right, helps hold the placard.

Council Asks New Policies To Spur Stagnant Economy

Job Safety Tops List:

Long Agenda Faces Lameduck Session

Passage of an effective occupational safety and health law is at the top of labor's agenda for the post-election session of the 91st Congress.

Congress returns Nov. 16 from an election recess to face what the AFL-CIO Executive Council termed a "shockingly long" list of unfinished business.

A Republican filibuster kept the Senate from acting on the safety-health bill before the mid-October recess and the Executive Council said it is "vitally necessary" that the legislation be passed before adjournment. Any bills left dangling then will be wiped off the calendar and the legislative process will have to start from scratch when the 92nd Congress convenes in January.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a news conference that the key to effective legislation is enforcement, and that is why labor is insistent on the bill sponsored by two New Jersey Democrats—Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels.

The Williams-Daniels bill assigns responsibility for establishing and enforcing safety-health standards to the Dept. of Labor which, Meany stressed, is supposed to concern itself with the welfare of working people.

He was sharply critical of Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson for his opposition to taking on the responsibility. And the Executive Council said it was "appalled" that the Secretary was supporting instead a "big-business-oriented measure" that it termed "weak, inadequate and an administrative monstrosity."

Jobless Rate Hits 5.6%, Wages Drop

By John R. Oravec

The nation's unemployment rate went up another notch in October—from 5.5 to 5.6 percent—to hit the highest level since January 1964, the Labor Dept. reported.

While the number of jobless workers remained close to the September mark of 4.7 million, seasonally adjusted, nonfarm payroll employment dropped to 70.1 million, a decline of 481,000, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Its monthly report attributed the decline largely to the direct and indirect effects of the auto strike. Although strikers are not counted as being unemployed, their absence affects the payroll employment category.

The job decline was most noticeable in manufacturing especially in the durable goods industries that includes transportation equipment. But employment in the nondurable

Rail Board Terms Called Insufficient

By Eugene A. Kelly

Four unions representing 400,000 railroad employes settled down for hard contract bargaining with the strong support of the AFL-CIO after calling a presidential emergency board proposal insufficient for a fair settlement of their long dispute with the carriers.

The five-man emergency panel named Sept. 18 by Pres. Nixon recommended wage increases totaling 32.5 percent in seven steps spread over a three-year period. It also recommended one "fringe" benefit asked by three of the unions—accident insurance coverage for off-track employes.

The board rejected all other union proposals for improved benefits and recommended that the railroad companies be given one of their major objectives—"substantial relief" from "restrictive" work rules.

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks said at a news conference in Washington that the recommendation falls short by 47.5 cents an hour of 1970 wage settlements for BRAC members in the airline and trucking industries, and is also deficient in other significant contract areas.

The panel's recommendations, Dennis said, may serve as a basis for renewed talks. He warned, however, that unless an acceptable proposal is made by the carriers before Dec. 1, he will have no choice except to call for a walkout of BRAC members on the railroads at 12:01 a.m. Dec. 11. Passenger, coal and defense-related rail services would be exempt from the strike, Dennis said.

"Railroad workers have had it,"

Hits Nixon 'Game Plan' As Failure

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO called for "immediate government action" to counter the "prolonged stagnation" of the economy without regard to the effect of policy changes on the 1972 election.

Citing the various powers given the President to cope with the economic situation, the federation's Executive Council called additionally for action at the upcoming lameduck session of Congress on an "irreducible minimum" of matters of major concern to the American people. (Story this page.)

The council's two-day fall session in Washington reviewed with general satisfaction the results of the 1970 elections and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that the outcome was a "net gain from our point of view" and a failure by the President to influence the results in key states.

It reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's strong support for Israel in the Middle East crisis and called for more economic and military assistance from the United States and the NATO powers. (Story, Page 3.)

In other areas, the council pledged federation support to the railroad unions in their current negotiations (Story this page), voted funds for the national committee to aid General Motors hardship cases and asked all affiliates to contribute, and supported a Bakery Workers' boycott of two firms engaged in a union-busting campaign (Story, Page 3).

Big Democratic Gains Brighten State Outlook

By David L. Perlman

Big Democratic gains in elections to state legislatures have brightened the outlook for labor's program and dimmed Republican hopes of picking up a substantial number of House seats in 1972 by redrawing congressional district boundaries for political advantage.

In the 45 states that elected legislators this year, Democrats came out with a net gain of more than 200 seats.

In at least seven states, they captured one or both houses of the legislature from Republican control. And they did not lose control of any house that already had a Democratic majority.

Reports from AFL-CIO state central bodies indicated that Democratic gains roughly matched liberal pickups. In a few states, increased Democratic majorities meant a switch of effective legislative control from conservatives to liberals.

The battle over congressional redistricting extends beyond the 16 states where population shifts uncovered by the 1970 Census dictate the gain or loss of House seats. Most of the other states will also have to redraw congressional boundaries to equalize population in accordance with the one-man, one-vote principle.

Tentative Settlement Reached in GM Strike

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached tentative agreement with General Motors Corp. on terms of a national contract covering 400,000 striking workers and started the process of sending the proposed terms to a vote of the members involved.

The UAW executive board took the first step by approving the GM agreement unanimously. Next came submission of the settlement proposal to the 350-member UAW-GM council, representing local unions across the country.

After intensive debate the council voted to recommend membership approval of a package described by UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock as one providing major gains in the four areas at the top of the union's priority list—markedly higher wages, removal of the cap on the cost-of-living escalator, the principle of retirement after 30 years service, and major improvements in the supplemental unemployment benefits program.

Approval of national contract terms will not automatically end the strike that started Sept. 15. The union traditionally has bargained on two levels — national and local. That means a favorable vote on national issues must be followed by membership approval of local supplementary agreements before plant picket lines are withdrawn.

Auto Workers Reach Tentative GM Accord

Still unsettled also is a national GM contract for some 25,000 UAW members in Canadian plants.

The GM proposal will give workers in U.S. plants wage increases ranging from 49 to 61 cents an hour this year, and two additional increases of 3 percent in the second and third years of the contract—plus cost-of-living raises.

For members who worked in strike-exempt plants, 26 cents of the 1970 wage hike will be retroactive for all hours worked since Sept. 15.

The cost-of-living clause of the contract calls for a further pay increase of 1 cent an hour for every .4 rise in the government's Consumer Price Index, with no ceiling. Another improvement will restore the quarterly adjustment of the CPI starting Dec. 6, 1971, and then every three months—a provision that was removed in the 1967 contract settlement.

A major UAW goal was the 30-and-out principle—pensions at any age after 30 years of GM service. The new pact makes it possible for 30-year workers beginning Oct. 1, 1971, to retire at any age with a $500 monthly pension, reduced by 8 percent for each year under age 58. A year later the early retirement age drops to 56, with an 8 percent reduction in benefit for each year of age below 56.

Other improvements include a new SUB plan, financed by GM contributions of 5 to 10 cents an hour per worker, instead of the present 5 to 7 cents; a fourth week of vacation after 20 years, instead of the present three weeks after 20; a paid holiday week beginning the day before Christmas and ending on New Year's Day; an extra day's pay as a Christmas week bonus; and improved sickness and accident insurance, along with changes in other fringe benefits and working conditions.

Full insurance costs will continue to be paid by GM.

The strike on both sides of the border was voted after General Motors, one of the world's largest profit-making corporations, made one unsatisfactory offer in contract negotiations and refused to improve it as the strike deadline drew near.

Virtually identical proposals were made by Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. but the UAW voted to strike only GM, the pacesetter in producing both autos and profits. It was the first GM strike since 1964.

The strike affects 145 manufacturing plants in the U.S. and Canada. GM also produces parts for other auto firms at 27 plants which were exempted from strike action, as were Ford and Chrysler plants.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is a member of a citizens' committee to aid the families of GM strikers. The committee is headed by former Sen. Paul Douglas of Illinois. Earlier, Meany had pledged the backing of the federation for the strikers, whose eventual victory, he declared, "is vital to all American workers."

State Dept. Panel Includes Unionists

Past Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists and Arthur A. Netrefa, retired staff representative of the same union, have been named as public members of State Dept. selection boards. The boards evaluate the performance of 3,100 foreign service officers and foreign service reserve officers in State Dept. offices around the world.

Siemiller is vice president for labor relations of the National Alliance of Businessmen, which helps find jobs in private business for the long-time unemployed. Netrefa was an IAM representative in the Chicago area from 1940 to 1968.

Rep. Dawson Dies at 84, Oldest House Member

Chicago—Rep. William L. Dawson, the first Negro to head a congressional committee, died here at the age of 84. Dawson, the oldest member of Congress, had announced his retirement and did not run for re-election this year.

A former Republican, he became a New Deal Democrat in 1939 and represented Chicago's South Side in Congress since 1942. He was chairman of the House Government Operations Committee.

Basis for Bargaining:

Emergency Board Proposal Short of Rail Unions' Goals

Dennis told a press conference. "We have been stalled and stalled. . . . We have been held back. We have not been given our just due. We now intend to get justice."

Officers of the three other unions involved issued a joint statement saying the 32.5 percent pay hike proposal "presents a basis for further negotiation and disposition of this issue." They called the proposed rules changes, however, "destructive of work methods and procedures that are an integral part of railroading."

The three are Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union, Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes and Vice Pres. Richard Smith of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, representing dining car crews.

Luna said the proposed rules changes would result in paycuts and layoffs for many UTU members. What the panel proposes, he said, "would give us wage increases with one hand and take them away with the other."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting in Washington, pledged strong support of the railroad unions in their battle "for fair contracts with substantial wage increases and realistic benefits."

For more than a year, the council said, the four unions have been "patiently seeking to win wage and benefit adjustments" on a par with other union settlements in the transportation industry.

During these months, the unions have complied fully with the requirements of the Railway Labor Act "to achieve a realistic economic agreement with the highly prosperous railroad industry," the council statement noted.

As a final step in the long negotiating process, Nixon appointed the emergency board after securing a court order halting a strike against three of the nation's 180 freight and passenger carriers.

The council observed that during the 30 days following the board's report, "the unions will endeavor to negotiate with the railroads, and after that 30-day period they will have the right under the law to order a strike in pursuit of their economic objectives."

Asserting that "further interference by the federal government after the provisions of the Railway Labor Act have been fulfilled would be unfair in the extreme," the council called on the carriers "to bargain in good faith, with recognition of contemporary wage trends, so that a work stoppage on the railroads may be averted this winter."

Following the council meeting, Pres. George Meany told newsmen that the railroad unions have observed the law for nearly 50 years, that they give up the right to strike for a period and that, when the law's processes are exhausted, "they should be free to strike the same as others."

If railroads cannot be subject to the normal stresses of labor-management relations and their employes are denied the right to strike, Meany said, "then the paramount public interest should indicate that there should not be a profit."

"If we get to that point," he declared, "I would advocate that the government take over the railroads.

"And frankly, the way the railroads are being run, I have an idea that might be an improvement."

Members of the emergency board included Chairman Lewis M. Gill, Robert O. Boyd, William H. Coburn, Jacob Seidenberg and Rolf Valtin, all Washington area arbitrators. Four of them presented the board's recommendations to the White House in Nixon's absence from Washington. The chairman reported that Boyd is hospitalized with a stroke but is expected to recover.

The board report notes that the carriers urged panel members to follow the "pattern" of past wage settlements with the shopcrafts and other unions—a 5 percent raise retroactive to last Jan. 1; increases of 4 cents an hour on Apr. 1 and Aug. 1, 1970; a 3 percent increase next Jan. 1, and another 3 percent a year later for a total of 11 percent, plus 8 cents an hour.

The board voted instead to recommend 5 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 32 cents effective Nov. 1, 1970, 4 percent next Apr. 1 and three additional raises of 5 percent each on Oct. 1, 1971, Apr. 1, 1972, and Oct. 1, 1972, for a total of 32.5 percent.

Gill pointed out that while the recommendations add up to "well over 9 percent a year in total increases," they are "well under 9 percent in actual cost to the railroads because of the deferred effective dates."

Actual costs, he said, would be 6.5 percent the first year, 4 and one-third percent the second year and 5.25 percent the third year—a total of 16 and one-twelfth percent.

The chairman noted that the board is recommending seven rules changes to meet the carriers' "most pressing immediate needs." The changes cover work rules on interdivisional runs, interchange of cars between railroads, combining the functions of road and yard employes and of clerk and telegrapher classifications.

He said the recommendations would give management "more leeway and flexibility in using the work force, speeding up the movement of trains through the yards, and generally improving the efficiency of operations."

In the board's opinion, the most important recommendation, according to Gill, is for the establishment of a high-level joint committee consisting of labor and management executives, to be headed by a neutral party chosen and paid for by the unions and carriers.

The board "envisions the standing committee as a body which will seek long-range reforms and solutions to numerous labor relations problems in the industry," the chairman said. It does not, however, recommend that the chairman be given the authority to make final and binding decisions—an authority favored by management.

The railroads frequently have charged they are hampered by costly outdated rules. Crotty summed up the position of his union on the subject: the rules are tied in with wages, some were negotiated in lieu of more wages, and they cannot be changed without considering their relation to wages.

Foreign-Made TV Films Hit As Job Threat

American industry continues to support foreign-made TV productions for use in the United States while thousands of film workers are without jobs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

It cited the example of General Mills, Inc., big cereal foods firm which bought a 30-minute Christmas animation television special to be shown in prime time over the CBS television network. The council noted also that a General Mills subsidiary, Kenner Toys, Inc., has contracted for four one-hour animated special films to be shown on CBS stations. All will be produced by Astransia Studio Inc. of Sydney, Australia.

"It will make for a cruel Christmas for the families of the American workers in this industry who are currently unemployed—30 percent of them," the statement said.

"The products advertised on these shows will not be purchased by these families—they won't be able to enjoy them."

The council emphasized that "when American industry purchases products such as these animated films from foreign concerns, it deprives American workers of jobs. In this case it deprives American families of a happy, merry Christmas."

Council Urges Action to Spur Economy

Nixon 'Game Plan' Scored as Failure

istration's "game plan" to cool the economy, the council said that "the Administration which choked off economic expansion in 1969 and engineered the recession, has thus far refused to provide the necessary stimulus" to change federal policy. It added:

"The American people need immediate government action to counter the present stagnation and rapidly bring the economy to full employment. Workers must not be compelled to endure additional months of spreading economic distress while the Administration debates the degree and timing of policy change geared to having the greatest political effect on the campaign of 1972." (Excerpts, Page 6.)

Meany stressed at press conferences that after 21 months of experience and trying to sell the electorate on its economic policies and getting turned down, it's time for the Administration to "change its game plan," which was conceived as reducing inflation without causing a rise in unemployment.

The hardships imposed by the Administration's "game plan" have been particularly severe on workers, the council pointed out, noting the drop in buying power, the continuing rise in the number of unemployed, the weakening job markets.

Only an immediate and sustained upturn can create the large and growing number of jobs needed to wipe out unemployment and care for a growing labor force, the council said, "but there is no such turnaround in sight."

It noted again the President's refusal to use the selective credit controls voted by Congress, along with other powers, and urged Congress to direct the Federal Reserve System to establish "low interest rate ceilings on specific types of loans and to allocate credit to where it will do the most good for America."

In other comments on the recent elections, Meany told reporters that the Administration was not very successful in its appeal to "blue collar" voters and workers generally, and that Vice Pres. Agnew was a great fund-raiser for the Republicans and a great entertainer but his value as a vote-getter was questionable.

Meany placed major emphasis on the necessity for the lameduck session to vote on meaningful job safety legislation, stressing especially the position of the Administration and Labor Sec. Hodgson in opposing a strong bill that would be administered by the Labor Dept.

Expanded Aid To Israel Held Vital to Peace

The "vital national interests" of the United States and its NATO allies "demand that we grant Israel unstinting help," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council adopted a statement noting with satisfaction that "our government has responded to Israel's plea for urgently needed military and economic assistance." Calling for even greater assistance, the council said the cost would be a "tiny fraction" of the price of a world war in the Middle East touched off by the Soviet Union's drive for domination of the area.

The U.S. government would be well-advised also, the council said, to insist that the newly extended cease-fire proposal "be made fool-proof through clearly specified enlarged powers of supervision for the prevention of violations."

This referred to the violation by the Soviet Union and Egypt of the earlier cease-fire agreement by installing new missiles in the Suez Canal zone area. The council urged the U.S. government "to persist in its demand for Egyptian withdrawal" of the missiles.

In a review of the Middle East situation, the council noted that "Israel has always maintained that direct negotiations between the embattled forces provide the best road to a just and lasting peace in the Middle East," and that over 20 years Egypt and her supporters had "consistently violated every cease-fire agreement negotiated through the United Nations."

Pilots Announce Plans For New Headquarters

Construction will begin immediately on a new, $5 million eight-story headquarters for the Air Line Pilots Association in Washington, D.C., the union announced. The building is expected to be ready for occupancy in the spring of 1972.

The new union headquarters will be located at Massachusetts Ave. and 17th St., N.W.

Efforts Backed to Improve War Prisoners' Treatment

The wide-ranging effort to insure humane treatment of American prisoners of war in North Viet Nam received the strong support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

In a statement marking the observance of Veterans Day, the council stressed concern for Americans held in North Viet Nam, "whose names are kept secret" by the captors.

The council cited the efforts of the American Legion and the American Red Cross to call world attention to treatment of American prisoners of war.

Special commendation should be given, the council said, to "the Red Cross campaign for mail urging the North Vietnamese, in the name of humanity, to provide the names of their prisoners, to guarantee them adequate diet and medical care and to permit the exchange of mail between prisoners and their families, and the American Legion program of prayer."

"No effort can be spared by the government or any American organization which believes in human decency to end the misery of the prisoners of war and their families," the council declared.

A REPORT ON THE ELECTIONS is made to the AFL-CIO Executive Council by National COPE Dir. Al Barkan. Election results generally favored endorsements of COPE state groups.

New Outreach Craft Training Set for 1,025

Local AFL-CIO Building Trades Councils will provide instructors to prepare 1,025 minority youths for apprenticeship entrance tests in 18 urban areas under a new government contract awarded the Workers' Defense League.

The 18-month Labor Dept. contract for $1,385,825 will be used to recruit and tutor the youths in Apprenticeship Outreach projects for 18 skilled building and construction trades.

Locations covered under the new agreement are the New York City areas of Brooklyn, Manhattan, and Harlem, and the counties of Westchester, Suffolk and Nassau; Buffalo and Rochester, N.Y.; Newark, N. J.; Bridgeport and New Haven, Conn.; Cleveland; Nashville; Lexington, Ky.; and Charlotte, Greensboro, Raleigh-Durham and Wilmington, N.C.

Through previous Outreach contracts with the Labor Dept. the Workers' Defense League placed about 2,000 minority apprentices up to last August, all but 120 in the building and construction trades.

The league, with the cooperation of the building trades councils, placed 304 electricians, 289 carpenters, 243 plumbers and pipefitters, 242 painters, 182 sheet metal workers, 90 iron workers, 79 roofers, 78 elevator constructors, 68 bricklayers, 61 cement masons, 55 plasterers, 49 glaziers, 46 machinists, 43 operating engineers, 19 lathers, 17 asbestos workers, 3 tile setters and 121 apprentices in miscellaneous trades.

The Labor Dept. reports that there are now 81 Outreach projects being operated by labor and community organizations in 83 major industrial areas.

Youngstown Sheet, Tube Agrees on Incentives

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers announced that 530 more employes of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. will receive incentive pay of 10 cents an hour under a just-concluded agreement between union and management.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said all but two of 11 major steel firms have agreed to incentive pay coverage for union members under a 1969 arbitration award. The latest pact raises to 13,970 the number of Sheet & Tube employes eligible for incentive pay in the company's plants at Youngstown, Struthers and Campbell, O., and East Chicago, Ind.

Bakery Union Backed In Boycott of 2 Firms

A consumer boycott by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers against two Eastern bakery firms has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which called on all affiliated unions to "give this struggle their full support."

The council said the entire bakery industry, organized and unorganized alike, is "watching with interest" the struggle of workers to win fair conditions from the Stroehmann Brothers Bakery, a six-state chain, and Schmidt Baking Co., with outlets in Baltimore and Cumberland, Md.

In effect, the two firms are the "advance guard for an industry-wide attack on the union," the statement declared. It noted that B&C members have been on strike in Cumberland for more than four months.

"Thirty years of industrial peace," the council said, were "shattered with the entrance of Stroehmann Brothers into Cumberland through the purchase of a previously independent company." Stroehmann, based in Williamsport, Pa., owns nine plants and warehouses. The council statement described it as "the most aggressive and fastest-growing independent wholesale bread producer" on the East Coast.

Stroehmann products sold in supermarkets and independent stores bear the brands of both Stroehmann and Ort's. Schmidt products are sold under the Schmidt Blue Ribbon brand.

When the Cumberland workers walked out over company provocation, the council noted, workers at other Stroehmann plants were fired for honoring picket lines established by the Cumberland strikers and for refusing to become strikebreakers.

When the strike was joined by Schmidt Baking employes in Cumberland, 90 percent of the company's Baltimore plant also struck, seeking recognition of the union. The council said the strike was called "after three previous attempts to secure union recognition were frustrated by long legal delays resulting in a large turnover of production workers."

The statement added that union representation elections were possible "only when management was certain that sufficient turnover had taken place" in employe ranks.

B&C launched its consumer boycott against both companies Oct. 8 in what the council statement described as an attempt to convince the companies that they should "engage in genuine collective bargaining."

The boycott was announced at a meeting at which representatives of the Retail Clerks, Meat Cutters and Teamsters pledged support of B&C's boycott effort.

Striking Clerks Reject Airline Settlement Bid

Minneapolis—Members of the Railway & Airline Clerks voted down a wage offer from the struck Northwest Airlines in favor of continuing their five-month strike until an acceptable back-to-work agreement is negotiated.

Any final settlement must be acceptable also to other unions whose members have been observing picket lines since 3,500 members of the Clerks walked out July 8 and posted pickets at 38 Northwest locations. The other unions include the Machinists and Transport Workers.

The wage proposal was sent to a vote to sound out membership sentiment, the Clerks said. Negotiations were to resume here after the Veterans Day holiday.

The walkout was called when management refused to offer contract terms comparable to those of other recent settlements in the airline industry.

Management's wage offer followed a ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Earl Larson that Northwest violated the Railway Labor Act by offering to protect employes against being ousted from the union if they abandon the strike and return to work.

During the strike Northwest shut down most of its domestic flights but continues to operate some overseas schedules with supervisory help and strikebreakers, BRAC said.

The Unfinished Business of Congress

Following is the text of the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on The Unfinished Business of the Congress, Washington, D.C., Nov. 9, 1970.

THE LIST of unfinished business before the 91st Congress is shockingly long.

While the time remaining at the disposal of the 91st Congress will not permit action on all the major matters of concern to the American people, the AFL-CIO Executive Council believes the Congress should act, as an irreducible minimum, on the following matters:

Occupational Safety & Health

A law giving the Secretary of Labor authority to establish uniform, national occupational safety and health standards, with the power to adequately enforce them, heads the list of vitally necessary action before the Congress.

The AFL-CIO strongly endorses the Williams-Daniels bill. It opposes any attempt by the Administration to substitute a big-business-oriented measure.

Labor seeks a bill fair and just to both employes and employers. Such a bill is indispensable to the life, health and safety of every American worker.

The Williams-Daniels bill vests responsibility for establishing and enforcing job safety and health standards in the Dept. of Labor. We are appalled by the Secretary of Labor's position in favor of a bill that is weak, inadequate and an administrative monstrosity.

Labor insists that the responsibility for implementing job health and safety legislation belongs with the Labor Dept., which exists to protect the interests of workers. We reject any attempt to fragment that responsibility and authority, which would ensure management control over standards and enforcement and thwart the purpose of the legislation.

Nomination of Sidney P. Marland, Jr.

The Senate must reject the presidential nomination for Commissioner of Education, because he is clearly unfit to hold high public office.

The AFL-CIO is deeply disappointed at Pres. Nixon's choice of Sidney P. Marland, Jr., as America's chief educator. The nomination reflects disregard for the rights and welfare of teachers, and raises realistic fears of undue influence on public education programs by private industry.

Our objections to Marland's appointment rest on two grounds:

First, Marland is an outspoken enemy of the right of teachers to have a voice in their own economic and professional affairs through the collective bargaining process.

Second, his close personal association with business leaders who are seeking ways to extract corporate profits from public school systems clearly casts the strongest doubt on his ability to defend the public interest and raises the specter of a conflict of interest.

The AFL-CIO believes that this nomination should be rejected quickly and decisively.

Political Broadcast Bill

The 1970 election campaigns demonstrated the urgent need for a measure which Pres. Nixon vetoed for political reasons—a measure to control political spending on television and radio.

Nothing has shaken public confidence in the American electoral system more than the demonstrated ability of a rich candidate to smother an opponent of more modest means in floods of purchased radio and TV propaganda.

The result has been to create serious and entirely justified fears that public office in America may soon be barred to all save the rich, or to those with wealthy supporters.

The Congress, having spoken decisively once in favor of setting aside the appearance that public office in America is a purchasable commodity, should lose no time in overriding the President's politically motivated veto.

Social Security

The Senate should continue the good work begun by its Finance Committee in improving the wholly inadequate social security bill passed by the House.

Labor fully supports that committee's action in rescheduling the proposed general increase in benefits from 5 percent to 10 percent, establishing a $100 minimum benefit and strengthening the cost-of-living escalator clause.

Welcome as they are, these improvements still fall short of making a real impact on the economic plight of the aged. The only solution to poverty among the old is to provide adequate benefits.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO vigorously opposes provisions in the House version that would make serious reductions in Medicaid coverage and services.

We urge the Senate to make this and other improvements, and to pass the kind of comprehensive social security legislation that will assure elderly Americans the right to live in decency during their declining years.

Family Assistance

The AFL-CIO reaffirms its support of the principle embodied in the Family Assistance Bill proposed by the Administration.

While proposed benefits fall short of need, the program of federal benefits to all families with children whose income is below poverty levels is a step in the right direction.

But the bill as passed by the House, and as now under consideration by the Senate Finance Committee, needs a number of improvements if it is to receive our support.

We urge the Senate to take the following constructive steps:

1. Assure the American people that the intent of Congress is that all Americans shall have the opportunity to live at standards not below the poverty level.

2. Guarantee that training and work assignments provide:

(a) The same standards of suitability now provided the unemployed covered by unemployment insurance, and

(b) the highest federal minimum wage required for covered employment or the prevailing wage, whichever is higher.

3. Provide that when the federal government assumes administrative functions now performed by state and local jurisdictions, the conditions of employment, including collective bargaining agreements, held by all employes shall be protected.

Foreign Trade

On foreign trade, the bill reported out by the Ways & Means committee of the House of Representatives represents a patchwork of forward and backward steps, in the light of very serious and growing problems that face America in the related areas of international trade and investment.

By deleting two of the House committee's backward-step proposals—tax deferral for export corporations and elimination of the American Selling Price—the bill that was tentatively approved by the Senate Finance Committee in September represents a substantial improvement. The tax deferral gimmick—called DISC—in particular, is a travesty of tax and trade legislation.

The AFL-CIO has urged the U.S. government:

1. To stop helping and subsidizing U.S. companies in setting up and operating foreign subsidiaries—for example, to repeal Section 807 and similar provisions of the Tariff Code, and to repeal the tax provision which permits the deferral of U.S. taxes on the income of U.S. companies from their foreign subsidiaries.

2. To supervise and curb the substantial outflows of American capital for the investments of U.S. companies in foreign operations.

3. To press, in appropriate international agencies, for the establishment of international fair labor standards in world trade.

4. As a stop-gap in the face of growing unresolved problems, to regulate the flow of imports into the U.S. of a variety of goods and product-lines, in which sharply rising imports are displacing significant percentages of U.S. production and employment in such markets.

The bills before the Congress fail to deal with the first three areas of needed action. However, they do deal, in part, with needed stop-gap measures.

The bills provide an approach toward curbing the flood of imports of textiles and apparel, as well as a partial approach toward curbing the rising import of shoes.

The proposed escape clause mechanism is much improved over existing legislation and procedures.

The proposed procedures to stem the rising flood-tide of imports of other products—such as electrical equipment—are a bow in the direction of required action, but there is reason to doubt the effectiveness of the complex and cumbersome methods that are proposed.

The most directly negative and harmful feature of the House Ways & Means committee bill, which the Senate Finance Committee has tentatively rejected, is the so-called DISC proposal. The AFL-CIO urges the Congress to reject this tax giveaway to large corporations.

The AFL-CIO also asks the Congress to support the Senate committee's tentative rejection of the House Ways & Means Committee proposal to eliminate the American Selling Price, which would impose especially severe tariff cuts on some chemicals—a selective action that could result in the loss of thousands of jobs.

With such changes, the proposed trade legislation would represent, for the most part, a step forward toward the needed modernization of U.S. government policies affecting international trade and investment.

Housing

Two major housing measures await action—one a substitute for a measure vetoed by Pres. Nixon. Both are fully supported by the AFL-CIO.

The substitute measure for the vetoed bill—the Independent Offices-HUD Appropriations Bill—needs immediate attention.

We were not impressed by the President's argument that the measure was inflationary and we urge the Congress to include in the bill $350 million more than the budget request for Urban Renewal and a similar additional $350 million for sewer and water projects.

The second bill, which would reauthorize present housing programs (with some changes), has been approved by the Senate and will be considered by the House.

The bill provides some additional grants to public housing programs to subsidize operational and maintenance expenses when rental income fails to cover such expenses.

The bill also provides:

- Federal assistance of $750 million to local public bodies to prevent reduction of mass transit services.
- Insurance for high crime areas.
- Pilot programs to reclaim abandoned housing.
- A new-communities program, providing grants toward planning, as well as guarantee and loan functions, within a newly established Community Development Corporation for which the bill authorizes $4 billion.

The House-reported bill is very similar, and includes a provision for an assistant secretary for nonprofit programs.

Electoral Reform

The Senate should act without delay on the proposed constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College in favor of direct popular election of the President.

The weight of support this measure has received in the House, (which over a year ago passed it by a vote of 329 to 70) and in every responsible segment of public opinion, makes it clear that those senators who filibustered to prevent action were defying the national will and thwarting the democratic process.

The AFL-CIO thoroughly agrees with the American Bar Association that the Electoral College method is "archaic, undemocratic, complex, ambiguous, indirect and dangerous."

We urge the Senate to act quickly in order to place the amendment in the hands of the state legislatures for action before the 1972 election.

Manpower

With nationwide unemployment reaching critical proportions, the AFL-CIO urges the House to pass without further delay the Employment & Training Opportunities bill.

This bipartisan bill, along with a similar measure passed by the Senate, is aimed at creating badly needed public service jobs and vastly improving the host of manpower training programs.

Scheduled for House action the first week that Congress returns, the Employment & Training Opportunities Act should be enacted into law as quickly as possible.

Minimum Wage

There is urgent need for the Congress to modernize the $1.60 minimum wage floor adopted in 1966. Today that wage falls far short of basic needs, and even the limited protection is denied to millions of workers.

The AFL-CIO strongly urges the immediate modernization of the Fair Labor Standards Act by:

- Increasing the minimum wage to at least $2 an hour.
- Extending coverage to the 17 million workers not now protected.
- Providing double-time pay for overtime work.
- Providing premium pay for overtime in excess of 8 hours a day.

Shortening the work week or the work year.

The Wage Board Bill

A wage board bill now in conference should be promptly reported and passed as a matter of justice for those government employes affected.

For Lameduck Session:

Job Safety Heads Congress Agenda

ledged that the lameduck session of Congress will not have time to act on all of its unfinished business. But it urged "as an irreducible minimum" the following priorities:

● Rejection by the Senate of the President's nomination of Sidney P. Marland, Jr., as Commissioner of Education "because he is clearly unfit to hold high public office."

The council cited Marland's "outspoken" opposition to collective bargaining for teachers and said the nomination "raises realistic fears of undue influence on public education programs by private industry."

● Overriding of the President's veto of the bill controlling political campaign spending on television and radio.

The council charged that Pres. Nixon vetoed the bill "for political reasons" and warned that public confidence in the electoral system has been shaken by "the demonstrated ability of a rich candidate to smother an opponent of more modest means in floods of purchased radio and TV propaganda."

● Improvement of social security benefits, building on the bill approved by the Senate Finance Committee, which includes a 10 percent benefit raise, a $100 minimum benefit and a more adequate cost-of-living escalator than the House-passed bill.

The council said the House bill, with a 5 percent raise and a cutback in Medicaid, is "wholly inadequate."

● Enactment of a family assistance welfare reform bill as "a step in the right direction" provided that major improvements are made in the House-passed version. Suitability standards for jobs should be the same as under the present unemployment compensation system, the council said, and should not pay less than the prevailing wage or the top federal minimum wage, whichever is higher.

● Passage as a "stop-gap" measure of a foreign trade bill if the House committee bill is improved by eliminating a "tax giveaway" to large corporations and by other changes. The council also opposed dropping the "American selling price" guide to chemical tariffs.

● Final action on two needed housing bills. On a pending appropriations bill, a substitute for one vetoed by the President, the council urged additional funds for urban renewal and for sewer and water projects—despite the President's objections. The other pending bill would extend present housing programs and authorize additional labor-supported steps to expand housing, improve communities and preserve mass transit services.

● Senate approval of the House-passed constitutional amendment proposal for direct election of the President. A filibuster blocked Senate action earlier this year, but the council urged the Senate to make a new try for approval.

● Immediate improvement of the Fair Labor Standards Act, including a higher minimum wage, extended coverage, more adequate premium pay and shorter hours of work.

● Completion of action on a bill now in conference to provide at least one extra pay step for the federal government's hourly-paid blue-collar workers, along with other improvements.

Ad Campaign Spurs Support Of Safety Bills

Newspapers in 23 cities across the country carried hard-hitting advertisements Nov. 11 calling for expressions of public support of the Williams-Daniels Occupational Safety & Health bills now before Congress.

The ads, ranging from a quarter-page to two-thirds of a page in size, were sponsored by the Steelworkers, Textile Workers, Communications Workers, Transport Workers and National Maritime Unions. The project was coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Pointing out that "each year, many more Americans die on the job, in industry, than on the battlefields of Indochina," the ads asked newspaper readers to tell their senators and congressmen of their support for the identical bills introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.) and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D.-N.J.).

The ads were timed to muster support for the bills before the Senate votes on the Williams bill. The vote is scheduled for Monday, Nov. 16.

Similar ads were placed earlier in the New York Times, the Washington Post and other newspapers by the IUD.

ENCOURAGED by election returns, House leaders announce that congressional Democrats will draw up their own legislative program for the 92nd Congress rather than merely react to the Administration's proposals. Majority Leader Carl Albert of Oklahoma, left, is expected to succeed John W. McCormack of Massachusetts as Speaker of the House in January. McCormack, who has served in Congress since 1928 and as Speaker since 1962, is retiring.

JOB PLACEMENT and development program launched by Syracuse labor with the aid of the New York State Dept. of Labor and the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute is discussed at a luncheon. From the left are Bill Mazur, executive secretary of the Greater Syracuse Labor Council; HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman, and Ray Baird, director of the program.

Government Contractor Held Bound by NLRA

Government contractors are bound by the same labor laws and successorship rules as any other employer, a National Labor Relations Board examiner ruled.

Rejecting contrary arguments by a contractor and the U.S. Air Force, Trial Examiner Thomas A. Ricci recommended that the company be ordered to negotiate contract terms with Public Service Local 1057 of the Laborers and sign an agreement if an understanding is reached.

The employer, Emerald Maintenance, Inc., also should be ordered to make restitution to employes at Laredo, Tex., Air Force Base for all contract benefits withheld since Apr. 1, 1970. Emerald won a maintenance contract at the base on that date by undercutting two competitors, the examiner said.

The two preceding contractors at Laredo AFB had contracts with the union providing wage and fringe benefit increases. The union notified Emerald and all other prospective bidders that it represented the employes and that the increases were not contained in the wage determinations listed by the government in its invitations to bid.

Emerald has since used substantially the same group of employes to do the maintenance work at Laredo but "refused to have anything to do with the union, rejected the contract conditions then in effect and fixed wages and other benefits below the contract level as though there had never been either a union or a contract," Ricci reported.

The company's defense was that, since it had to underbid the predecessor companies to win the contract award, it "follows logically that it must be permitted to pay the employes less than had been agreed by their union."

Refuting this argument, the NLRB aide ruled that Emerald is a successor employer who is bound to recognize the union and fulfill the terms of the contract.

The Air Force, in a court brief, argued that successorship rules do not apply to contractors under the Service Contracts Act. Ricci said that if this were true, then among civilian employes of a government contractor "there may be no union activity, no union representation and no collective bargaining."

That was not what Congress intended or it would have said so, the examiner declared. He ruled also that Emerald is a private employer, an independent contractor, and as an employer is "subject to all the laws applicable to private industry."

Similarly rejecting Emerald's claim, he said the firm "came down from the northern reaches of Idaho to the Mexican border to undercut" two competitors, "to take the business away from them, and at least one of its aces in the hole was a plan to place the burden of its lesser bid upon the employes."

Such a method of doing business, if upheld, would "make a mockery" of the entire collective bargaining principle and the labor law itself, the examiner said.

Jobless IBEW Members Granted Trade Act Aid

Workers at the Chicopee and Ludlow, Mass., plants of General Instruments Corp. who were laid off when the multinational corporation began importing electronic components, have been certified eligible for trade adjustment payments.

This is the first certification by the Labor Dept. in the electronics industry. Previous certifications were made in such areas as glass and ceramics, rubber footwear and piano manufacturing.

The employes involved are members of Local 1500 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who lost their jobs at the plants operated by F. W. Sickles Division of General Instruments.

Local 1500 had about 3,400 members three years ago. But after General Instruments switched much of its production to plants in Taiwan and Portugal, jobs at the Massachusetts facilities were cut back and the local's membership nosedived. About 2,000 members are affected, the IBEW said.

The Ludlow plant, with more than 900 workers, was completely shut down last year. The Chicopee plant continues to operate with a smaller workforce, producing some television components and processing components made in the Taiwan and Portuguese facilities, the Labor Dept. said.

The loss in jobs has been totally attributed to General Instruments' policy of switching to overseas production, the IBEW noted.

The union presented its case to the U.S. Tariff Commission earlier this year. The commission split evenly on whether the workers' jobs were affected by the imports. But Pres. Nixon broke the tie and authorized the Secretary of Labor to certify the workers for benefits under provisions of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

The Labor Dept. said that the certification provides that workers from the Sickles plants who became unemployed or underemployed after Oct. 18, 1968, are eligible to apply for adjustment assistance. This assistance includes cash readjustment allowances, testing, counseling, training and job placement, and relocation if needed or desired.

Payments up to $85 a week are allowed for 52 weeks, but an extension of 26 weeks is permitted to enable workers to complete approved training courses. An additional 13 weeks of payments is also allowed for workers over 60 who lost their jobs.

Syracuse Drive For 200 Jobs Aided by HRDI

Syracuse, N. Y.—A drive to find jobs for 200 disadvantaged workers has been launched by Syracuse Labor Council with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and a grant of $43,000 from the New York State Dept. of Labor.

The program is part of a nationwide effort by HRDI to open up job opportunities for the poor, for minorities and for the underemployed. HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman pointed out that in a period of increasing unemployment, unions can play a key role in finding jobs that might not be available through other channels.

To get the program started, all business agents, local union officers and national union staff representatives will canvass the companies they deal with for job opportunities. Any openings will be reported to the labor council's job development and placement staff.

The council will work with the State Employment Service, the Urban League and Syracuse's anti-poverty agency to find workers to fill the openings. After the worker is placed, the council will provide counselling and other needed services.

Labor central bodies in ten more cities will be starting similar operations within the next six months, HRDI said.

Pilots Strike Mohawk After Year of Talk

Utica, N.Y.—Mohawk Airlines was struck by 400 members of the Air Line Pilots after a year of unproductive negotiations. The line canceled all 450 of its daily flights and laid off 2,500 nonstriking employes.

Capt. Jack Moxian, master chairman for Mohawk pilots, said "many basic and important issues" remained to be settled as labor and company negotiators continued to meet at National Mediation Board offices.

The union served a strike notice on management Nov. 6 after all mediation processes had been exhausted and an impasse continued. Mozian said the pilots want a new working agreement that will bring their contract into line with those of other airlines and improve working conditions, scheduling rules and other major terms.

The pilots had been legally free to strike at the end of a 30-day "cooling-off" period under the Railway Labor Act. They fly routes to New York City, upper New York state, Washington, Boston, Providence, Hartford, Detroit, Cleveland, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, Montreal, Toronto.

Flight crews are stationed principally here and in Boston, Buffalo, Newark and New York City.

The National Economy

THE RECESSION of last winter and spring has been stretched out into prolonged stagnation, with no sign of a decisive and sustained upturn.

Nearly two years of the Administration's economic policies are continuing to produce climbing living costs and extortionate interest rates on long-term loans, as well as increasing unemployment.

Since January 1969, when the Administration took office, economic distress has spread from six major industrial areas to 38. In addition, the Labor Dept. reports substantial unemployment in 588 smaller industrial communities.

Thirteen percent of America's households, surveyed in October, reported a decline in incomes in the past 12 months—due to cuts in working hours and rising joblessness. After accounting for the additional impact of increased living costs, a much larger percentage of America's households has suffered a drop in buying power.

Although the Administration's squeeze on the economy was devised in the name of combatting inflation, the cost-of-living has climbed more than 10 percent in 20 months.

The hardships imposed by the Administration's "game plan" have been particularly severe on workers.

● The buying power of the after-tax weekly earnings of the average non-supervisory worker in private employment—about 48 million—is below a year ago and even below what it was five years ago.

● Job markets in most parts of the economy are continuing to weaken slowly, after a sharp decline between last December and May.

● The number of unemployed, in October, was up to 4.7 million or 5.6 percent of the labor force—up 2 million since the Administration took office.

● Unemployment rates have reached 11.9 percent among construction workers, 6.7 percent among manufacturing workers, 17.1 percent among teenagers and 9.3 percent among non-whites.

● While the burden of unemployment has fallen heaviest on factory and construction workers, the economic slump has also produced the greatest drop of white-collar clerical, technical and professional jobs in manufacturing industries since the end of World War II—down 175,000 in the past year.

Only an immediate, substantial and sustained upturn in sales and production can create the large and growing number of job opportunities needed for the unemployed and the growing labor force, in a period of rising productivity and declining military production. But there is no such turn-around in sight.

The solution requires a decisive change in the federal government's policy. But the Administration, which choked off economic expansion in 1969 and engineered the recession, has thus far refused to provide the necessary stimulus.

The American people need immediate government action to counter the present stagnation and rapidly bring the economy to full employment. Workers must not be compelled to endure additional months of spreading economic distress, while the Administration debates the degree and timing of policy changes geared to having the greatest political effect on the campaign of 1972.

Fumble!

A Word Edgewise:

Princeton Political Action Plan Failed to Stir Most Students

By John P. Roche

AROUND A HUNDRED American colleges and universities followed the so-called Princeton Plan, instituting a recess to permit their students to go out and engage in political activity. Most of these institutions acted in haste last May, when almost anything that would mollify student opinion was rushed through faculty meetings, and have been repenting at leisure.

For the plain fact is that, while a lot of students had the week off, there was no particular surge of youthful political activity. My wife reported that there was a sizable contingent of college students at church the Sunday before election—they had just come home to visit—so the program may have had some unanticipated benefits.

The problem with the Princeton Plan was not that it was designed to stimulate student political activity. It is great to have students active in politics. When I ran for local office and my wife ran for the Pennsylvania legislature, we had a devoted cadre of students. But they volunteered their time, skipped some classes, made up the work, and never asked that Haverford College give them a bonus for their good citizenship.

In short, they were not ordered into politics by faculty or student vote—they were active because they were self-propelled, because they enjoyed it. Even though it was part of their education, they did not expect academic credit. One gets educated in all sorts of odd places (God, what I learned in the Army!) without expecting academic brownie-points.

No, the difficulty with the Princeton Plan lay on two other levels. First, however much one talks about the flexibility of the university calendar, it was a "political" gesture. It was not set up with the thought in mind that rightwing candidates would profit.

Of course, a college or university can adjust its calendar any way it wants—two weeks on, two weeks off; close in the winter and stay open in the summer (which makes some sense up here in Massachusetts); by semesters, quarters, or trimesters—but all calendars on the Princeton Plan were changed identically as part of a panic syndrome.

To one who has spent most of his working life in the academy, this lack of courage is—sad to say—hardly startling. But beyond that, there was an amazing lack of intelligence involved in sponsoring the plan.

The notion that were students given a week off to work in elections, they would in fact work in elections is simply naive. Most students, like their elders, are non-political and there is no provision in the Constitution that anyone has to be political. One of the things that helps to stabilize our society is that at any given moment most Americans are not jumping up and down—a wholly politicized society would be a lunatic asylum.

BUT THERE is even more to it than that. People talk of politics as a "game," or an "art," even a "science"—in fact politics is a form of religious behavior. Once one gets caught in the net, he enters a different world, he finds his every waking minute devoted to his constituency, or his potential constituency.

He may in fact float off into a world of his own, dominated by a private revelation that the masses are waiting for him. (How else can one explain the political sleep-walking of such otherwise intelligent men as Harold Stassen, Kenneth O'Donnell, or Theodore Sorensen?)

Some young people catch the bug—Gene McCarthy had a fine group of dedicated enthusiasts—but for most it is foreign territory. The latter arrive at headquarters armed with their impressive intellectual credentials, usually expecting to be named field marshals—and some maniac hands each a list of a thousand voters to be contacted and offered rides to the polling place.

Money is needed, so they are asked to do a house-to-house canvass of the Democrats (or Republicans) inviting contributions. Most make one or two hesitant pitches and quit; the one with the bug hits them all (and often discovers that the party faithful are delighted to see him, glad to learn their party is in business).

Politics is a "love it or leave it" proposition. Those who love it need no Princeton Plan; those who do not will never be turned on by such an institutional arrangement.

Ill-Conceived Provisions:

10-Year Record Disproves Need for Landrum-Griffin

The following is excerpted from "Landrum-Griffin: The First Decade," by J. Albert Woll, general counsel of the AFL-CIO, which appears in the November 1970 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE DEPT. OF LABOR office charged with enforcement of the Landrum-Griffin Act has summarized the law's first 10 years, reporting on its impact on labor unions, their officers and employes.

In short, the report emphatically refutes the claims of those who argued for the enactment of the law by characterizing labor organizations as racket infested, corrupt and undemocratic. The report demonstrates that there was no need in 1959 for the broad reach of the Landrum-Griffin Act, as finally drawn, and there is no need today for the continuance of many of its ill-conceived provisions.

The law was sold to the American public in 1959 as a mild reform measure allegedly needed to purge the American trade union movement of corruption. Formally known as the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, it was spawned largely by the well-publicized investigation conducted by the Senate committee under the guidance of Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.).

The result of this clamor was an extremely complicated, confusing and detailed law which included a conglomeration of provisions dealing with many facets of union activity.

During the first 10 years of the act's existence, approximately 67,000 union organizational or information reports have been filed with the Secretary of Labor. In addition, over 500,000 annual financial reports have been filed by unions. These organizational and financial reports lay bare almost every phase of internal union activity and procedure.

A disclosure file for each reporting labor organization is maintained at the national headquarters of the Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports. Also, in each of its 24 area offices throughout the country, one can find duplicate disclosure files for all unions within the geographic jurisdiction of the particular area office.

If unions are as racket infested, corruption prone and undemocratically run as was charged at the McClellan hearings, it would follow that the Labor and Justice Departments must have been very busy during the 10 years, filing court suits to correct these evils.

But what is this 10-year record? According to the report by the Labor Department, approximately 52,000 labor organizations have filed Title II reports during each of the first 10 years of the Landrum-Griffin Act. Estimating that these labor organizations have an average of at least seven officers per union, approximately 365,000 union officials have been subject to the criminal provisions of the law each year.

Yet, in the 10 years, only 628 union representatives have been indicted—an average of less than 63 each year—for violations of the law's criminal provisions. Only 485—an average of less than 49 each year—have been convicted of such violations.

About 97 percent of the convictions secured involved Title II violations, such as filing false union reports, making false entries in union records, failing to keep union records, failing to file union reports, destruction of union records, and the closely-related crime of embezzlement proscribed in Title V.

OF THE 365,000 union representatives actively engaged in the daily business of running a labor union, seven have been convicted of depriving other union members of their rights through acts of force or violence, with seven others tried on similar charges and acquitted; four have been convicted of illegally holding union office; one was found guilty of destroying union records; three were indicted for failure to file union officer and employe reports, but none was convicted for after one of the three was acquitted, indictments against the other two were dismissed; three were charged with failure to secure union bonds, but again with none convicted.

The record, therefore, discloses that only 12 union representatives out of 365,000, or three one-thousandths of 1 percent (.003 percent) have been convicted during the first 10 years for Landrum-Griffin Act crimes other than embezzlement and those offenses dealing with union reporting under Title II of the act.

Of the approximately 52,000 local unions filing disclosure reports in each of the 10 years the Landrum-Griffin Act has been in existence, each must have had at least three elections since 1959 because under the act, local unions must hold an election at least once every three years. So the 52,000 local unions have held at least 156,000 elections during the first 10 years.

After 10 years under the law, the Secretary of Labor had sought court authority to set aside only 177 such elections; 155 of these law suits have been filed against local unions, 10 have been filed against intermediate bodies, such as district councils, and nine have been filed against national and international unions. Two suits named both a local union and a district council as defendants and one action was instituted against a national union and one of its districts.

Up to June 30, 1969, final disposition has been made of 123 of these civil court actions. Of those 123 cases, 79 of the defendant unions were required to hold new elections under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor as a result of adverse court decisions or stipulations filed with the courts; 21 cases were settled by the unions involved stipulating that their future elections would be conducted in compliance with federal law; 10 cases were dismissed by agreement or at the request of the secretary; in 13 cases the court upheld the validity of the elections and refused the secretary's request to set them aside.

National Blood Bank Proposed To Help Stem Costs, Disease

A NATIONAL BLOOD banking program is needed to curb the high cost of blood and to cut the risk of disease from transfusions, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis declared.

Perlis said that blood banking in the United States is now "a number of uncoordinated, and in some ways uncooperative" programs. He cited the rising trend toward "commercial blood banks" as a major obstacle in developing the kind of program it will take to "meet the needs of the American people."

Commercial blood banking has become a "lucrative business," he declared, and often has the support of local organized medical societies and proprietary hospitals. Pointing out that commercial blood banks are often located in "skid row areas," he said that blood purchased for $15 a unit is eventually sold for as much as $50 or $60—"sometimes far beyond that, in the case of rare types."

Besides being costly, Perlis said, blood from commercial banks carries a high risk of disease, mainly hepatitis.

He urged the American Red Cross to take the lead in a drive for a national "blood assurance program" based on public service voluntary donors. He said that while the Red Cross now has the biggest non-profit blood banking program, it has not had an "aggressive and dynamic" program to recruit voluntary donors since World War II.

PERLIS PREDICTED that if the spotlight of public opinion is put on the present state of blood banking and an effective donor recruitment drive is mounted, "120 million (donors) could be encouraged to give blood," and meet the demand on a voluntary non-profit basis. The AFL-CIO would "not only help, but cooperate vigorously" in that kind of effort, Perlis asserted.

Perlis appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IT IS CHARACTERISTIC of much American legislation to lay down noble principles and then to accompany these with all sorts of amendments that take a good deal of the nobility out of it.

This was true of the Taft-Hartley Act, which echoed the noble purpose of the original Wagner Act in proclaiming that it was the policy of the U.S. government to encourage unions and collective bargaining and then proceeded to set up conditions that weakened that policy considerably.

It was true of the "full" Employment Act, which ended up only encouraging the provision of useful employment opportunities, a far cry from the original concept of the "right to a job" for every American.

Currently we have a food stamp program that calls for the use of America's vast agricultural surpluses "to safeguard the health and well-being of the nation's population and raise levels of nutrition among low-income households."

Yet, conservative interests have long been trying and are still trying to water down this concept, notably in cases where poor people happen to be strikers. By a twist of really mean-spirited logic the "health and well-being" of strikers who happen to be poor is cast aside in favor of support for great corporations that would just as soon see their strikers starve and so be forced to accept substandard contracts.

Right now an effort to bar otherwise eligible strikers from buying food stamps for their "health and welfare," including above all that of their children, is in progress in the automobile strike. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce wants to keep food stamps from strikers; a number of Michigan newspapers and friends of General Motors would like to do the same.

THE RENEWAL LEGISLATION, as reported out by the House Agricultural Committee, is a harsh bill. It is true that it specifically says that an eligible worker shall not be denied food stamps because he is on strike. But it does make it a great deal harder for a striker to become eligible for food stamps than at present.

He would be ineligible for food stamps if he refused another job at the $1.60 minimum wage, a condition even harsher than that under the Unemployment Compensation Act. In addition, tougher financial conditions would be called for.

On top of the House committee action, there is strong likelihood of the introduction of an amendment that would deny in specific language the right of eligible strikers to buy food stamps. Such a move was defeated in the House two years ago through the intervention of Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.). Mrs. Sullivan is expected again to fight off any such move.

In any event, the answers to the anti-union forces that have been used in the past to defeat the anti-striker move are still valid.

- The very purpose of the food stamp program—"to safeguard the health and well-being" of Americans who need the program—would be defeated. There can be no possible moral justification to deny needed food to men, women and children no matter what the circumstances.
- Of the utmost importance is the fact that to deny strikers food stamp rights because they are on strike would be in complete contradiction of the National Labor Relations Act which guarantees workers that very right.
- Corporations argue that it is their tax dollars that are being used to support a food stamp program which "takes sides" against them in a strike situation; workers are taxpayers and are still taxpayers—strike or no strike.
- If food stamps, in the name of impartiality, are to be denied strikers, are corporations to have their government contracts cancelled or denied them in the name of that same impartiality?
- Finally, the whole purpose of modern labor law is to calm rather than exacerbate conflict between employer and employe. Sooner or later strikes come to an end. Are good labor relations to be encouraged through the denial of needed food to workers and their families? Is hunger a weapon that a modern employer really is willing to use?

VOLUNTARY BLOOD BANK program should be expanded and strengthened to meet the public's need and cut down on the risk of disease transmitted from "skid row" commercial blood banks, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis says. He is questioned on Labor News Conference by Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Reports on Medicine & Health, and Harry Conn, right, of Press Associates, Inc.

Faulty Waterproofing Methods Open New Flood of Complaints

By Sidney Margolius

WITH HOME REMODELING problems already No. 1 on the Better Business Bureaus' complaint list, many homeowners in cities around the country now are reporting disappointment and financial losses from pressure-pumping methods of waterproofing basements.

You may have observed such ads as "Basements Made Dry Without Digging." This process tries to inject a sealing material called Volclay or Bentonite by pumping it under pressure around the exterior of the basement or foundation.

As the St. Louis Better Business Bureau explains the process, the material is supposed to penetrate the soil and set up a bond against the porous areas of the foundation. But in areas of compacted or clay-like soil, the material simply does not penetrate satisfactorily and does not seal off leakage, the BBB reports.

In New York City, Consumer Affairs Commissioner Bess Myerson Grant asked the courts to enjoin Vulcan Waterproofing, Inc. from continuing to make what Mrs. Grant charged were "a variety of misrepresentations."

For example, she reports, while Vulcan advertised that its waterproofing method keeps basements dry permanently, in actual fact the method did not solve leakage in at least half of its applications because of water, soil and topographical conditions with which the process can't cope.

In various cities, the complaints also have been made that the method has been advertised as "government approved." Actually the Federal Housing Administration will not insure financing for basement waterproofing processes using this method. The St. Louis BBB reports that two Vulcan franchised operators are on the FHA precautionary list. The Minnesota state attorney general got a court injunction as far back as 1965 against further operations by a Vulcan franchisee.

At one point the St. Louis BBB had as many as 150 complaints about Vulcan and two other operators there—the Hydroclay Basement Waterproofing Co. and Hydroseal, Inc.

You do have to look closely at the guarantee claims, not only those made by Vulcan operators but by the hundreds of other companies now offering waterproofing without digging. One company, All-Weather Exteriors, Inc. advertises: "Ask About Our Conditional Guarantee." That's an interesting switch from the usual "unconditional guarantee" if you notice that the "un" has been left out.

A Vulcan operator advertises "Gov. Patented." Don't construe that as "government approved." Anything that is patented is patented by the government.

Some of the advertising claims are strong indeed, such as the promise to "eliminate damp-leaky basements . . . forever," made by Hydro-Clay Process, another company that operates nationally through franchises.

WHILE PRESSURE waterproofing is of dubious effectiveness, the prices charged can be high indeed. Some homeowners have paid $800 to $1,200 for jobs proved unsatisfactory. Sometimes the waterproofing firms have gone out of business altogether leaving hundreds of complaints unadjusted.

Waterproofing guarantees are not the only home improvement performance claims that may be ridden with loopholes. A revealing one came to light recently in relation to aluminum siding. A homeowner complained that the siding was guaranteed against fading, blistering, peeling, cracking, chipping and so on but not against separating from the material to which it was applied, as happened to her siding.

Way-Out Style of Dress Gives People-Watchers Extra Bonus

By Jane Goodsell

PEOPLE, Scott Fitzgerald once said, are what they look like.

If that was ever true—and I think that, in a sense, it was—it's not so today.

Stockbrokers, once nearly as recognizable as Santa Claus by the way they dressed (button-down collars, narrow lapels, garter-length socks, conservative ties, crew cuts) are now sporting desert boots, ascot scarves, safari shirts, tartan trousers and paisley jackets, not to mention handlebar moustaches, sideburns and flowing beards.

Suburban housewives, who used to make their daily rounds uniformed in sweaters and skirts or shiftwaist dresses, now wheel their babies and their marketbaskets clad in black vinyl jump suits, harem pants, Zulu dog collars, tie-dyed bellbottoms, patchwork skirts and see-through blouses.

College campuses today appear to be inhabited by movie extras costumed in Indian blankets, Mexican serapes, orange monks' robes, beads, bangles, body paint, steel-rimmed glasses, beaded headbands, black motorcycle jackets, tattered jeans, paint-stained shifts, pith helmets, confederate army uniforms, nose rings, shaved heads, you name it. In fact, there's almost nothing you don't see on a college campus except students who look like students.

A man I know who recently visited Harvard Yard described it as looking like a gypsy encampment. "It beats me," he said. "I remember the trauma I went through as an undergrad when I discovered that the leather elbow patches on my tweed jacket weren't the kind everybody else was wearing. Today anything goes." He shook his head in dazed disbelief.

A couple of weeks later, I bumped into this same gentleman in a theater lobby. He was wearing a fringed shirt and was growing sideburns and a moustache.

"Why not?" he said with a shrug in answer to my raised eyebrows. "Everybody else is doing it."

THAT'S NOT exactly true, of course. There are still quite a few barbered heads and tailored suits around. And many ladies still go to parties in little black dresses and pearls—although you don't notice them much, overshadowed as they are by the swingier types gotten up as gypsy dancers, harem slaves, Spanish gauchos, Bavarian peasants and Russian cossacks.

But it is true that things certainly have changed. The traditional values of Good Grooming and Proper Dress have been displaced by the newer morality of self-expression or "doing your own thing." Once the exclusive province of anti-establishment longhairs, looking far-out has been adopted by people who aren't protesting anything but are simply indulging in the old childhood game of playing dress-ups.

"People don't try to look nice anymore," I overheard a lady remark to her companion. "They try to look outrageous."

She's quite right, but I find it hard to lament. Looking at people who look nice is a dull spectator sport. And people-watching has never been half as much fun as it is today.

Peril on the Job:

Hazards Explored In Chemical Plants

A NEW BOOK, Peril on the Job, strives "to identify those root causes and the system of management" which are responsible for heavy casualties among the work force of the petroleum, chemical and petrochemical industries of the United States. It also searches for improved safety and health techniques in those industries.

The volume is based on several hundred interviews with employes of these industries, together with research into the health and safety practices—or lack of them—in these important American industries.

Peril on the Job was written by Ray Davidson, public relations director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. It records a tragic history of neglect for life and limb in the chemical plants and oil refineries of the nation.

Because it is documented with "true life stories" from the workers in these industries, Peril on the Job serves as a powerful challenge to industry, and the American public, to bring about overdue improvement in the safety of the work-place.

AFL-CIO PRES. George Meany, commenting on the findings of the book, noted that "the tremendous volume of occupational sickness and accidents in the factories, mines and shops of the nation is appalling."

"Peril on the Job," Meany said, "points to the particular dangers to which oil and chemical workers are exposed, and thereby it provides a great service. It is essential that we make America cleaner, safer and healthier. There is little time to waste."

Davidson, who compiled the research and wrote the volume as a special union project under the direction of OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron, lists these general points relating to the hazards of work in the oil and chemical industries:

- "Management operates by the dollar yardstick. . . . Because dollar value cannot be put on human life and health, even the best-intentioned managers are handicapped and frustrated. Life and health are intangibles which cannot be entered on ledger sheets or production reports."
- "Closely related is excessive zeal for production. . . . Production has become a way of industrial life that is almost obsessive."
- "Science is worshiped like a god in America. Yet science, supposedly precise and formal, is full of unknowns. Industrial workers, and most of their supervisors, blindly grope through a chemical jungle full of lurking dangers they do not know and cannot identify."
- "In an indirect but very real sense, the greatest killer of all is, perhaps, bureaucracy. Corporate managers speak of responsibility as a first article of faith, but in most companies responsibility is so diffused that it cannot be accurately attributed to any one executive."

The solution, as Davidson expresses it in Peril on the Job, is for a markedly heightened concern by labor, management and government with the problems of health and safety.

"The challenge to management," Davidson writes, "is to surrender some of its rigidly retained responsibility and control. The challenge to government is to seek out facts and truths about present-day occupational and health hazards and to make its police power available on a standby basis so it can enforce law and order in the workplaces if management and labor fail to do so. The challenge to unions is to fulfill their responsibility to working people by insisting that every man and woman has a safe and healthful place in which to work."

For Labor's Program:

Democratic Gains Brighten Outlook in State Legislatures

Generally, the redistricting will continue the trend towards greater suburban political representation at the expense of both rural areas and inner cities. But a party that controls the legislature can often draw the new districts to its advantage, particularly if the governor who holds a veto power is of the same political party.

In California, Republicans put an unprecedented amount of money and political effort into the legislative elections because the prize was rich—five new congressional seats and a redrawing of all of the state's political boundaries.

But Democrats took both houses of the legislature away from the GOP and they will draw up the new districts, balanced by the veto power of a Republican governor.

In Pennsylvania, which loses two House seats, Democrats now hold both houses of the legislature—for the first time since 1936—and took over the governorship as well.

The geography of population changes virtually assures a Republican gain from Florida's three new House seats. But a Democratic legislature and governor will presumably keep the GOP pickup to a minimum.

New York, which loses two House seats, continues with a Republican governor and a Republican legislature. But it is one of only 11 states to come out of the election with that combination.

Subject to possible changes from recounts and absentee ballot tallies, Democrats will control both houses of the legislature in 24 states—of which 16 also have Democratic governors. Republicans will have full control of 17 legislatures—11 in states with GOP governors. The remainder have divided political control.

A pre-election story in the Wall Street Journal pointed up the political bread-and-butter issues involved:

"The control of the state legislatures after this election will determine control of the House during the decade of the '70s," Republican National Chairman Rogers Morton was quoted as telling party workers.

And the campaign manager for John Gilligan, now the Democratic governor-elect in Ohio, said, "It's a question of who puts the crayons on the Rand-McNally. If we win, we pick up the crayons."

Gilligan and most of his statewide running mates won in Ohio and in this particular case will "pick up the crayons" even though the legislature remains Republican. That's because Democrats will make up a majority of the state's reapportionment board, which in Ohio initially draws up the new district boundaries.

The nature of the population shifts, regardless of political control within the state, appears to point to a modest Republican advantage in congressional reapportionment. But the pickup will certainly be considerably less than the GOP tacticians anticipated before the Nov. 3 election.

Voters in most states also had an assortment of referenda issues and state constitutional amendments on the ballot—with mixed results.

Arkansas voters refused to repeal the state's full-crew law, establishing minimum crew sizes for railroad trains. Repeal had been sought by railroad management, strongly opposed by labor.

Proposals to lower the voting age—meaningful only if the Supreme Court voids the congressional law establishing a nationwide 18-year-old franchise—were on the ballot in 14 states, but approved in only four.

Maine and Nebraska dropped the voting age to 20, and Montana and Massachusetts to 19. Earlier this year, during the primary election, Alaska had reduced the state's 19-year-old voting age to 18.

But voters in Colorado, Minnesota, New Jersey, South Dakota, Washington and Wyoming refused to approve a 19-year-old voting age; Connecticut, Florida and Michigan rejected an 18-year-old vote, as did Hawaii, which now lets 19-year-olds vote.

State bond authorizations drew mixed results. Bonds to finance anti-pollution sewage treatment facilities won strong support, but most proposals for bonds to improve schools and colleges went down to defeat.

Also rejected were low-income housing financing authority in three states where it was a ballot issue—New York, Maryland and Michigan.

State constitutional amendments to allow "liquor by the drink" sales passed in Texas but lost in Kansas. Maryland voted to permit voluntary school prayer; Michigan and Nebraska voters insisted on a ban on aid to parochial schools. Washington state voters legalized abortions. Virginians repealed a ban on lotteries but Arizonans rejected a state lottery. Massachusetts voters endorsed the present policy of planned withdrawal of troops from Viet Nam as against either immediate withdrawal or carrying on to a military victory. And Washington voters turned down an initiative proposal that would have required a 5-cent deposit on both bottles and cans of beer and soft drinks.

No elections to legislatures were held this year in Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Jersey and Virginia. Of the 45 states that chose one or both houses of their legislatures, these were the most important political shifts:

Alaska—Democrats expanded their House majority from 22-18 to 31-9. With half of the Senate seats up for election, an 11-9 Republican majority was transformed into a 10-10 split, with a Democratic lieutenant-governor able to break the tie.

California—Republicans went into the election with both houses of the legislature. Democrats gained four seats in the lower house to win 43-37 control and won 12 of the 20 Senate seats up this year to switch a 21-19 majority from Republican to Democratic.

Illinois—Instead of 95 Republicans and 82 Democrats, the House now has 89 Republicans and 88 Democrats. The state Senate, previously Republican by a 38-19 margin, now will be evenly split, 29-29. But while the state has a Republican governor, a Democratic lieutenant-governor presides over the Senate and he told newsmen, "I will certainly vote with my party to break any ties."

Massachusetts — Democratic gains give the legislature a better chance of overriding a Republican governor's vetoes.

Michigan — Democrats retained the House and gained a 19-19 tie in the Senate, but a Republican lieutenant-governor will be able to break ties.

Minnesota—Party labels are not used, but the State AFL-CIO reports that the previous legislature had 44 conservatives, 23 liberals in the Senate; the new Senate will have 33 conservatives, 33 liberals, and one swing vote in the middle. The conservative majority in the House was substantially reduced.

North Dakota—Topheavy Republican majorities were considerably reduced by a Democratic gain of 21 seats in the House and seven in the Senate.

Ohio—Reduced Republican majorities mean that the legislature will not have enough GOP votes to override vetoes by the new Democratic governor.

Pennsylvania—Democrats expanded their majority in the House and won the Senate for the first time since Franklin D. Roosevelt headed the ticket in 1936 and only the second time since the Civil War.

Tennessee—Democrats gained seven seats to recapture the House, 56-43, and retained Senate control. But the outlook for legislative progress is dimmed by a new Republican governor.

Texas—Democrats retained a topheavy majority. But the significant change reported by the State AFL-CIO is that for the first time "progressive Democrats supported by organized labor have won a majority of the seats in the Texas Senate." The House, however, remains "much more conservative than the Senate."

Utah—The House switched from 48-21 Republican to a 37-32 Democratic majority. The GOP margin in the Senate was cut by four to 16-12.

Washington — Democrats strengthened Senate control and picked up at least five seats in the House, with a slim possibility of control if absentee ballot counts overturn narrow Republican leads in two of three Senate districts.

Wisconsin—The lower house had been Republican, 52-48. It shifted to a 67-33 Democratic majority. With only half of Senate seats up, the GOP margin was cut by two to 20-13.

Union Joins in Forming Fire Protection Council

Williamsburg, Va.—The Fire Fighters joined with nine other organizations representing about 25,000 fire departments to form the Joint Council of National Fire Service Organizations.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan said the meeting, the first of its kind in this country, is an "unprecedented united effort to improve the nation's fire services and help the American public."

McClennan said he speaks for nearly 150,000 organized professional firemen who believe the council "symbolizes a new era in improving fire prevention and fire fighting effectiveness."

He predicted that the public "will be a prime beneficiary of this effort, in terms both of lives saved and dollars saved."

Prof. John L. Bryan of the University of Maryland's college of engineering was moderator of the meeting. McClennan and IAFF Sec.-Treas. Albert E. Albertoni were delegates, along with representatives from the following organizations:

The Fire Marshals Association of North America; Fire Protection Research International; International Association of Fire Chiefs; International Fire Administration Institute; International Fire Service Training Association; International Society of Fire Service Instructors; Metropolitan Chiefs Committee of the IAFC, and the National Fire Protection Association.

The joint council set these goals:

- Developing nationally recognized standards for competency and achievement of skills appropriate to every level of the fire service career.
- Making the public aware of the "significant contributions" of the fire service in protecting life and property and contributing to the standard of living "to which all citizens are entitled."
- Making public officials more aware of their responsibilities in providing increased financial and moral support for the fire service.
- Reassessing public fire protection to assure appropriate protection for all communities at a reasonable cost.

Other objectives include the establishment of realistic standards of educational achievement, with equal educational opportunities for firemen; nationwide information systems with special emphasis on life and safety factors; research and development needed for the "prompt and successful" implementation of these goals.

Industry Urged To Join Health Insurance Push

Chicago—American business and industry were urged to join the growing campaign for national health insurance to halt rising, uncontrolled health costs and assure adequate care to all their employes.

A national health insurance plan would be less costly to most employers than the present wasteful, ineffective and inefficient health care system, said Leonard Woodcock, president of the Committee for National Health Insurance.

Woodcock's message to the American Management Association Employe Benefit and Pension Conference was delivered by Melvin A. Glasser, director of the UAW Social Security Dept.

He noted that health care is the only product purchased by American business and industry over which few if any quality or cost controls are required despite an annual and rising expense of $15 billion.

NEWLY-ELECTED secretary-treasurer of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers is 29-year-old J. Pat Daniels, one of the youngest persons to be elected to a high union office.

Airline Agents Hail 'Milestone' Frontier Pact

Chicago—Members of the Air Line Employes on Frontier Airlines voted 1,253 to 52 to ratify a 34-month contract the union called a "milestone" in its 18-year history.

The contract, agreed to only 15 minutes before a midnight strike deadline, is notable for a top salary of $1,000 a month to station and ticket agents and for raises as high as 82 percent for reservations agents, ALEA said.

The terms, retroactive to last March, provide an additional $75 a month for senior agents; hourly shift premiums of 21, 28 and 31 cents for afternoon, night and relief hours; and an agreement to phase out split shifts over the contract term.

Management agreed that overtime work will be on a voluntary basis only at the rate of time and a half for the first day off, double time for the second, and two and one-half times regular rates for more than eight hours' work on the second day.

Other improvements were made in vacations, holidays, sick leave, severance pay, insurance and a company-paid dental program. Frontier is one of 10 airlines with which the union bargains. To date, seven have agreed to new contract terms.

U.S. DELEGATION LEADERS to the International Labor Organization's maritime conference report on a successful effort to stem Communist attacks on the United States and the American labor movement, while leading the fight to upgrade conditions for merchant seamen. From left are James Reynolds, management delegation; Assistant Sec. of Commerce Andrew E. Gibson, government delegation, and Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall, worker delegation.

Standards for Seamen Upgraded, Attacks on U.S. Stemmed in ILO

New York—The U.S. delegation to the International Labor Organization's maritime conference succeeded in stemming the recent trend of political attacks on the United States by Communist bloc nations in the ILO and led the drive to improve worldwide standards of pay and working conditions for merchant seamen.

At a press briefing in New York City, the delegation's leaders reported on the progress of the three-week conference in Geneva involving representatives of seamen's unions, shipowners and governments of 65 maritime countries.

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., who headed the U.S. worker delegation, said that unlike a June meeting of the ILO when 34 political attacks were launched against the United States, the maritime conference was marred by only one such incident.

It came in a tirade by the Cuban delegation, which drew a stern rebuke from the conference president, Nagendra Singh of India.

Following the rebuff of the Cubans, the conference settled down to working towards the solutions of seafarers' problems. Hall termed the sessions "productive for the professional seamen."

The recommendations of the conference call for bigger and better-equipped living quarters, improved recreational facilities, air conditioning of crew quarters and a number of health and safety guidelines.

The 534 delegates also referred for study by a joint committee of the ILO and the World Health Organization a resolution submitted by Hall to provide medical training of crew members on ships without doctors. The effort is designed to deal more effectively with injuries and illnesses among the crews.

A recommendation for increasing the minimum wage of able seamen from the $70 set in 1958 to $100 a month to offset higher living costs was adopted.

Another member of the U.S. worker delegation, Vice Pres. Peter Bocker of the National Maritime Union, said that the various recommendations combined "a reasoned and quite realistic appraisal of the problems created by technological change with an "equally realistic attempt to find a genuine solution."

Hall was accompanied at the press briefing by Assistant Sec. of Commerce Andrew E. Gibson, chief of the government delegation, and Pres. James Reynolds of the American Institute of Shipping, head of the management delegation.

Hall suggested that the United States adopt an attitude of "watchful waiting and full participation" in the affairs of the ILO before it considers renewing its financial contribution to the world labor body.

The maritime conference was the first meeting of the ILO since Congress voted to withhold this year's U.S. contribution of $3.7 million to the organization.

Gibson said that the action of Congress and the attitude of American labor was "completely understandable."

The United States "had to make it plain" to the Communist bloc that Congress was "reflecting the great disenchantment" of organized labor and business, Gibson stressed.

Reynolds said that because the conference was stripped of political attacks, the delegates "emerged with a sense of brotherhood among seamen around the world."

The three U.S. delegation leaders agreed that the United States should continue to participate in the ILO.

Hall said that the American trade union movement "has a deep obligation to fight like hell to make the concepts of the ILO work," adding, "but you don't pay a lynch mob to string you up."

Hall predicted that the political attacks would stop in the ILO because the Soviets want to maintain a worldwide forum "and the ILO is one of them."

But "the Soviets learned at the maritime conference that they're going to have to abide by the rules of the road," Hall declared.

Gibson pointed out that the Soviet Union participated in the ILO for years without paying its dues and that the Cubans had finally paid their dues just before the maritime conference.

The non-Communist worker delegates scored a victory when the resolutions committee killed a proposal to expand the present ILO maritime commission to add government to the present union-management representation.

That move was viewed as an effort to increase Communist influence in the ILO.

Worker delegates at the conference re-elected Hall to the commission in secret balloting.

Recommendations adopted at the three-week conference will be submitted for ratification as binding treaties to the 121 ILO member nations.

Household Income Up 8.3 Percent in 1969

Median household income in the United States rose to $8,390 in 1969, an 8.3 percent increase from $7,740 in 1968, the Bureau of the Census reported.

During the same period households with incomes of less than $3,000 declined by approximately 600,000, the report also shows.

Of 62.9 million households in the United States in 1969, 10.2 million —16.2 percent of total—had incomes under $3,000. A year earlier, there were 10.8 million households, or 17 percent of the total, in this category.

Another 7.5 mililon households last year had incomes of $3,000 to $5,000 and 20.2 million received $5,000 to $9,000. About 25 million households (40 percent of the total) had incomes of more than $10,000, an increase of 3.7 million households over the number in 1968, the report said.

Median family income was $9,400 during 1969, according to a recent census report. The median figure for households is somewhat lower because it includes income from one-person households.

White households in 1969 had a median income of $8,760 compared with $5,290 for Negro households. For nonfarm households, the 1969 median was $8,499 and for farm households, $5,936. Households headed by persons 25 years old or over with a college education showed a median income of $13,756; those headed by a high school graduate, $9,640, and those headed by a grammar school graduate, $5,936.

The median is the income value which divides the population in half, with one half having incomes above the median, the other having incomes below the median. A household by census definition consists of all persons who occupy a housing unit. In 1969, the 62.9 million households in the nation included 51.2 million families.

Hartke Claims Victory:

Five Close Contests Led by Democrats

Democrats continued to hold the lead in five extremely close election races where Republican candidates have refused to concede pending recounts, official canvasses, or absentee ballot tallies.

The apparent winners in the contests are:

● Sen. Vance Hartke, Indiana Democrat who claimed victory for a third Senate term with a margin of at least 5,000 votes out of 1.7 million cast. Republican Richard L. Roudebush has not yet made a firm decision on whether to seek a recount.

● Gov. Kenneth M. Curtis, Maine Democrat, who won re-election by 833 votes in the unofficial tally. A recount is scheduled to begin Nov. 23 and may take weeks to complete.

● Gov. Frank Licht, Rhode Island Democrat, who held a lead of 2,134 votes towards re-election—with 7,551 absentee ballots remaining to be counted. Republican Herbert F. Desimone is still hopeful.

● David Hall, who led incumbent Oklahoma Republican Gov. Dewey F. Bartlett by 2,819 votes. A recount is in progress.

● Romano T. Mazzoli, Kentucky Democrat, who led incumbent Rep. William O. Cowger by 210 votes in the initial complete tally.

Mazzoli's election would give the Democrats a net gain of nine House seats. Actually, their pick-up from the 1968 election is 12 House seats, since Democrats took over three Republican seats in special elections held during 1969 to fill vacancies. All three of the winning Democrats were re-elected this year.

Unless the leads are upset, the new 92nd Congress will have 255 Democrats and 180 Republicans. The Senate will have 54 persons elected as Democrats, 44 elected as Republicans, one independent expected to caucus with the Democrats and one Conservative who will caucus with the Republicans.

As of January, there will be 29 Democratic governors and 21 Republican governors.

The Nov. 3 election will have an impact on the post-election "lame-duck" session of the 91st Congress, which convenes Nov. 16.

In the Senate, newly-elected Adlai E. Stevenson III will immediately replace the Republican he defeated, Sen. Ralph T. Smith of Illinois. That's because Smith was appointed to fill the term of the late Everett McKinley Dirksen until an election could be held. Stevenson will now serve out the balance of Dirken's term, which runs through 1972.

The situation is somewhat less clear in New York, where Republican Charles E. Goodell had been appointed after the death of Robert F. Kennedy, whose term would have expired at the end of this year. When Goodell was appointed, a state law specified that he would serve until Dec. 1, 1970. But a subsequent state law allows appointees to remain in office until the end of the term of the senator they replaced.

Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has not yet said how he will interpret the law. Whatever his decision, either Goodell or the election winner, James L. Buckley could challenge it.

Five congressmen elected in districts where incumbents had resigned or died—three Republicans and two Democrats—will be able to get the jump on other newly-elected representatives by claiming their seats in the lame-duck session. Besides giving them a vote and an earlier paycheck, the head start gives them a jump in the all-important seniority list.

There was strong speculation that ailing Sen. Karl E. Mundt (R-S.D.) would be urged to resign so that the state's lame-duck Republican governor could name a Republican to succeed him. But Mrs. Mundt expressed the belief that her husband is on his way to recovery from a stroke.

The post-mortems on the elections continued, with Pres. Nixon leading an Administration effort to picture the nationwide Democratic victories as somehow representing a Republican gain.

THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT of 1970 could be called "the miracle of the 91st Congress," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland tells a luncheon meeting of the federation's Maritime Trades Dept. The bill, he notes, will provide thousands of jobs and hold in the United States millions of dollars that would have been spent abroad at a time when federal spending is being cut in defense, construction and the aerospace industry.

Energy Needs Seen Spurring Nuclear Power

Kansas City, Mo.—The need to expand all energy resources in the nation to forestall electric power shortages was urged by U.S. Atomic Energy Commissioner James Ramey at the 18th annual Atomic Energy Conference of the Machinists here.

"Unless nuclear power is developed and used," Ramey said, "we will fast approach a point where the demand for energy outstrips our ability to make that energy available."

Ramey also predicted that the growth of atomic energy will open up 28,000 new jobs by the end of 1975. He said nuclear power plant construction will provide work for an additional 13,700 construction workers.

Dr. Thomas Mancusco, research professor of occupational health at the University of Pittsburgh, told the conference that the occupational health and safety bill now before Congress would be a boon to badly needed research on the health and safety of American workers.

New Maritime Law 'Salvaging' U.S. Fleet

The recently signed Merchant Marine Act of 1970 will "salvage the maritime industry" and gives rise to hope that other American industries can also escape "unfair foreign competition," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland, addressing a luncheon meeting of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., said the new maritime program provides incentives to phase out the "runaway fleet" over the next 20 years.

American owners of "foreign-flag ships" will be able to compete profitably within the American system without being forced to lower their standards, he said. Construction subsidies, tax deferment privileges and operating subsidies are the means provided by the bill to save "a vital industry."

"This may have come just in time," Kirkland added. He noted that the Soviet Union recently expanded its maritime sphere by gaining entry at U.S. ports. Thus the United States faces even stiffer competition than it had in the past, with a fleet depleted by "years of neglect and indifference."

"For that reason," he said, "we cannot afford any delay in implementing all of the programs of progress contained in the Merchant Marine Act of 1970."

He emphasized that American flag ships must be given increased cargo—now less than 5 percent of United States imports and exports—not only to gain maximum benefits from the new ships that will be built, but as an "added inducement to bring back under the American banner the 'runaway fleet' that has been a prime competitor for American cargo during the past two years."

Kirkland pointed out that other American industries—textile, electronics, glass-ceramic tile and shoe—have also been "critically hurt by foreign imports produced by men and women who are forced to work under conditions that were abolished in our nation a century ago." Their problems must be solved, he said, "without lowering American standards."

"We simply cannot permit competition from American owned 'runaway' industries to force our standard of life to be reduced to that of the less fortunate peoples of the world."

The 1970 Merchant Marine Act, Kirkland observed, represents "the classic form of cooperation between labor, management and government toward the just solution of a difficult problem."

He said the act will benefit the entire nation because thousands of jobs will be provided in construction and operation and "millions of dollars that would have been spent abroad will now be invested on our own shores."

"The full utilization of that fleet will, in turn," he continued, "produce decent wages, fair profits and federal, state and local taxes to help pay for the urgent needs of a progressive society."

Jobless Rate Reaches 5.6 Percent, Highest Level Since January 1964

goods sector—as in food products, textiles and apparel—also swung downward.

The BLS also reported that average weekly earnings for non-supervisory workers on private payrolls dropped 33 cents to $121.03 in October. Over the year ended in September, average weekly earnings were up 3 percent, but after adjustment for consumer price increases the earnings were down 2.5 percent, the report noted.

The actual number of unemployed workers last month was 4.3 million. This is 1.4 million more than in October 1969 when the jobless rate was 3.8 percent. The over-the-year increase includes 725,000 adult men, 400,000 adult women and 300,000 teenagers.

Much of the October increase in the jobless rate affected married men—the heads of households and breadwinners—whose rate rose to 3.1 percent from 2.9 percent the month earlier.

While the jobless rate of blue-collar workers eased from 7.5 percent in September to 7.2 percent, the rate for white-collar workers rose from 2.8 percent to 3.2 percent, the highest since November 1961.

Overall, the jobless rate for adult men was up one-tenth of 1 percent from September to 4.1 percent. The rate held steady for adult women at 5.1 percent and climbed three-tenths of 1 percent to 17.1 percent for teenagers.

The rate for white workers was 5.2 percent, up one-tenth of 1 percent, and for Negroes 9.3 percent, up three-tenths of 1 percent.

The BLS report showed that factory jobs declined 609,000 over the month. This number includes 325,000 auto workers out on strike. A "significant part" of the remaining 284,000 was attributed to the secondary effects of the strike.

The durable goods sector of manufacturing was down 525,000 jobs from September seasonally adjusted. Heading the drop were transportation equipment, down 280,000; electrical equipment, down 68,000; primary metals, down 53,000; nonelectrical machinery, down 43,000, and fabricated metal products, down 39,000.

Payroll employment in the non-durable goods industries—almost totally unrelated to auto production—slipped by 84,000 jobs in October. These included 28,000 in food products, 19,000 in rubber and plastic products, 13,000 in apparel and 10,000 in textile mill products.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls last month held at the September level of 36.9 hours.

In manufacturing, the average workweek rose one-tenth of 1 hour to 39.4 hours. This is four-tenths of 1 hour below August and 1.1 hours below October 1969.

The increase was credited to the rise in the workweek in the non-durable goods sector, up from 38.6 hours to 38.9 hours. Overtime hours in manufacturing held at 2.7 hours, the lowest mark since 1963.

The jobless rate for workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs climbed from 4.2 to 4.4 percent in October, double that of the same month a year ago and the highest since January 1964.

The number of workers out of jobs 15 weeks or longer totaled 745,000 seasonally adjusted, down slightly from September. But the number of persons unemployed from one to 14 weeks rose by about 100,000 to 3.9 million.

Interest Cuts Leave Rates Still Too High

The nation's interest rate structure is still "too high" to provide the lift needed for real economic growth and full employment, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathan Goldfinger said.

His comments came as the Chase Manhattan Bank, one of the nation's largest, cut its prime interest rate for its best customers from 7½ to 7¼ percent and the Federal Reserve Board lowered its discount rate from 6 to 5¾ percent.

These are "slight steps in the right direction," said Goldfinger, but they still leave the overall scale of interest rates too high.

The Federal Reserve action is the first downward movement in the discount rate—the interest rate charged banks when they borrow from Federal Reserve banks—since August 1968.

Public Service Jobs Plan Approved in House Action

Job Safety Bill Passed By Senate

The congressional battle over job safety and occupational health legislation shifted to the House, where a labor-supported bill is scheduled for floor action before the Thanksgiving holiday recess.

The Senate passed its version of the bill after a heated two-day debate which centered on the issue of where to put responsibility for setting and enforcing job saftey and health standards.

An Administration effort to create one presidentially-appointed board to draw up standards and another to enforce them was beaten on a close 41-39 vote.

The Administration substitute bill had been strongly supported by employer groups—and strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO. The federation's Executive Council had termed it "weak, inadequate and an administrative monstrosity" and urged that full responsibility be assigned to the Dept. of Labor, "which exists to protect the interests of workers."

But a solid Republican lineup, bolstered by some conservative Democratic votes, succeeded in amending the bill and splitting off its enforcement functions.

As in the original bill, the Secretary of Labor would have responsibility for setting standards and Labor Dept. inspectors would be assigned to check for violations.

But the legal power to order employers to correct violations—except in emergencies—would rest with an independent commission appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation.

The amendment for an independent enforcement commission, proposed by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), was written into the bill by a 43-38 vote.

Eleven Democrats, all from the South, voted with 32 Republicans to adopt the Javits amendment. All 38 votes against dilution of the original bill were cast by Democrats.

On the earlier vote, rejecting the Administration substitute proposed by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.), seven Republicans including Javits voted with the bulk of the Democrats.

I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., issued a statement deploring adoption of the Javits amendment and urging the House to pass intact the bill approved by its Labor Committee.

Division of responsibility, he charged, would both delay enforcement and create "a legal nightmare."

The Senate, however, rejected another Administration-sought amendment which would have required

'Patchwork' Trade Bill Clears House

A sharply-divided House passed and sent to the Senate a foreign trade bill that the AFL-CIO had termed "a patchwork of forward and backward steps."

While the House considered the bill under a no-amendment closed rule, the legislation will be wide open to amendment on the Senate side.

The Senate Finance Committee has already given tentative approval to a revised bill that the AFL-CIO Executive Council said would represent, "for the most part, a step forward."

It took three see-sawing votes before the House agreed to the no-amendment policy it traditionally adopts for complex tax and tariff legislation.

First, it appeared that the House had rejected a closed rule by a 203-186 vote. Then the House voted 201-192 against a modified rule proposed by Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.). This would have permitted amendments to delete any portion of the committee bill, but not to add new sections. In a final reversal, the House voted 203-186 to go back to the original closed rule.

With amendments foreclosed, the House spent a day in general debate on the bill.

Opponents tried to have the bill sent back to committee, but the motion was defeated, 206-173. Passage of the bill followed.

As sent to the Senate, the trade bill would establish a quota system setting a ceiling on imports of textiles and shoes, two industries where employment has slumped because imports have captured a still-rising share of the American market.

OFF-BROADWAY THEATERS in New York City are picketed by members of Actors' Equity in efforts to win a new contract setting increased weekly minimum wages. Here, Rip Torn and his wife, actress Geraldine Page, march outside a theater where the play "One Night Stands of a Noisy Stranger" by Shelley Winters was scheduled to open. The actors are asking a minimum wage of $125 a week initially, increasing to $130 a week plus cost-of-living adjustments in the third year. (Story, Page 3.)

80% of Cost Covered By Federal Aid

By David L. Perlman

The House passed a bipartisan manpower training bill by a one-sided margin, virtually assuring that a public service jobs program long sought by the AFL-CIO will be launched during 1971.

It was the first major action by the post-election session.

An even larger-scaled program had been approved by the Senate in September, and a House-Senate conference committee will take on the assignment of drawing up the final version of the legislation.

Both bills provide 80 percent federal financing of the cost of putting unemployed and underemployed workers on city, state and other public service payrolls to perform "necessary and vital work."

The House bill would begin with authorization for 75,000 job slots in the year starting July 1, moving to 112,000 by the third year. The Senate version—fought by the Administration—would start at 150,000 public service jobs and grow to 500,000 in four years.

Both bills, while allowing a considerable degree of flexibility in the use of manpower training funds, require the Secretary of Labor to spend a portion of the manpower budget on the new public service jobs program.

The legislation would decentralize control of most manpower programs from the federal government to the states and large cities.

The Secretary of Labor would negotiate agreements with governors and mayors that would give them direct control over manpower programs in their areas, allowing funds to be channeled into projects considered most useful in each community. An important provision, assuring that cities will not be bypassed, gives preference to a

To Override Veto:

New Test Is Slated On TV Spending Bill

A Congress just returned from the costliest non-presidential election campaign in the nation's history prepared to vote on whether to override Pres. Nixon's veto of a bill intended to prevent candidates with the most money from dominating the airwaves during political campaigns.

The vetoed bill would limit the amount of money that could be spent on political broadcasts. It would require television and radio stations to sell campaign time at the station's lowest rate. And it would repeal an "equal time" technicality that has made it difficult for stations to offer free time for debates between major candidates.

The Senate is scheduled to vote on overriding on Nov. 23. If the needed two-thirds majority is achieved, the House will then vote on repassing the bill over the veto.

Congress was urged to override the "politically motivated" veto by the AFL-CIO Executive Council which warned that "public office in America may soon be barred to all save the rich, or to those with wealthy supporters" unless a lid is put on political spending.

Impressive new support for the vetoed bill came from a bipartisan association of political campaign managers. The American Association of Political Consultants, which brought together campaign strategists for Democratic and Republican candidates, liberals and conservatives, unanimously adopted a resolution urging that the veto be overridden.

The association's president is F. Clifton White, campaign manager for New York's Conservative Sen.-Elect James L. Buckley. The group which approved the resolution in-

Court Urged to Uphold Bargaining for Retirees

Millions of American workers and retirees will be adversely affected if the Supreme Court does not set aside a lower court ruling that an employer need not bargain over benefits for retired workers, the AFL-CIO told the high court.

The federation filed a 22-page brief asking the Supreme Court to review and reverse a finding by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati that retirees are not employes and their union therefore cannot bargain collectively on their behalf.

The AFL-CIO was joined in its brief by the Auto Workers. Separate briefs asking the court to review the case were filed by the National Labor Relations Board and the Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers of America, Local 1. The latter union has for 21 years been bargaining agent for hourly-paid employes of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. plant in Barberton, O., where the case arose.

The issue involved is whether an employer violates the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to bargain with a union over changes in benefits covering workers who have retired. The NLRB and the unions argue that he does violate the law by such refusal. The Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. and the appeals judges assert that he does not.

The case got to the appeals court

GM Strikers Hailed On 'Splendid Victory'

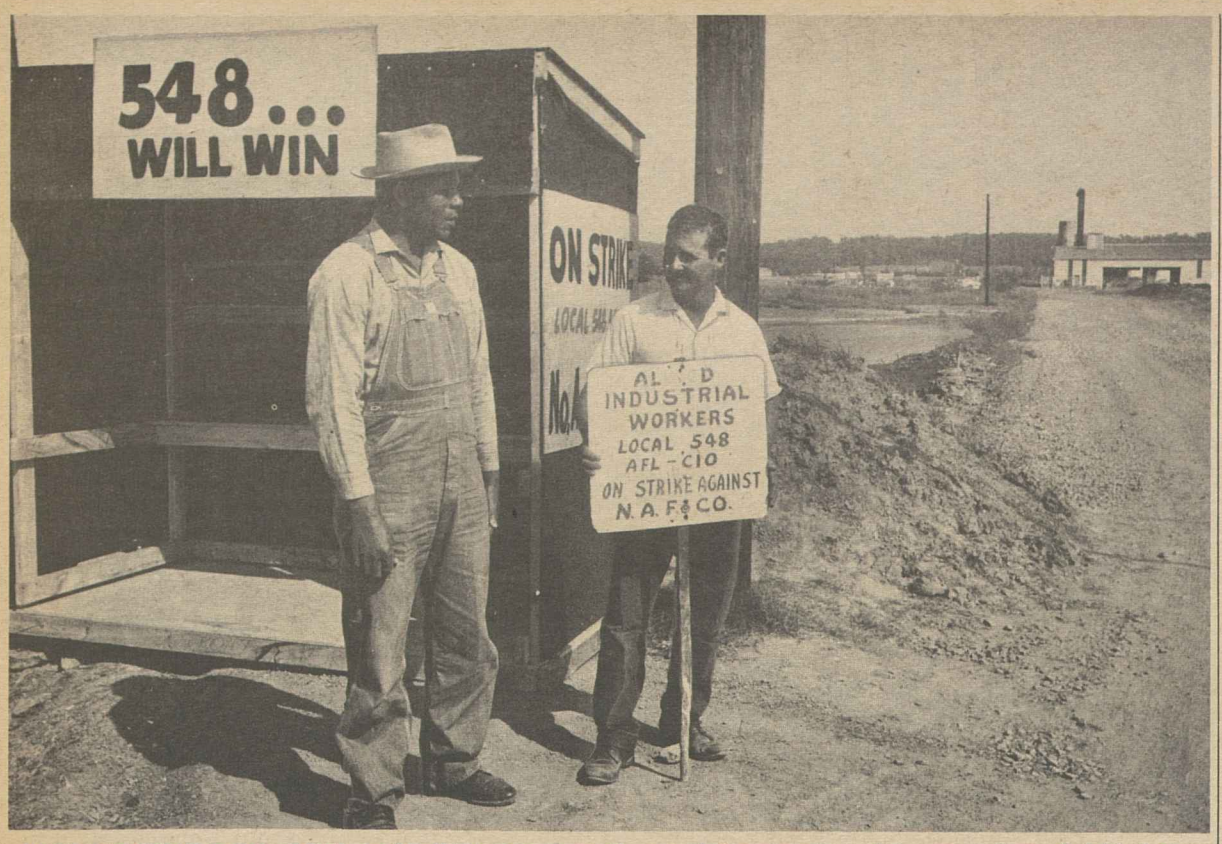
General Motors strikers "deserve the highest commendation" for the courage and trade union spirit that produced a contract after a two-month strike, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message to Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers.



"Warmest congratulations to you, your fellow officers and UAW members on a splendid trade union victory," Meany wrote.

"You have once again proven the viability of collective bargaining as a vehicle for solid progress for workers."

The courage and spirit of the strikers "made this victory possible and they deserve the highest commendation," Meany said.

Woodcock and other union negotiators have recommended that UAW members in GM plants accept the tentative settlement and return to work after local supplemental agreements have been negotiated. Meanwhile, the strike that started Sept. 15 continues as members vote on acceptance or rejec-

PICKET SHELTER SIGN, "548 Will Win," spells out determination of a new union of Allied Industrial Workers to win a first contract from the North American Foundry Co. in Fort Smith, Ark. Some 80 members, on strike since Mar. 24, report management has been importing strikebreakers from Mexico and Texas and housing them in the plant to break the strike.

Across the Border:

Union Hits Imports —of Strikebreakers

Fort Smith, Ark.—Union pickets have marched for eight months outside the North American Foundry Co. here while imported strtikebreakers are housed inside.

The strikebreakers, bused from Mexico and the border city of Brownsville, Tex., stay a few weeks, move on, and are replaced by new transients. While here they live in virtual peonage, the Allied Industrial Workers report.

Foundry employes voted for the union in a National Labor Relations Board last February. They walked out when the foundry managers refused to negotiate fair contract terms and will stay out "as long as it takes," according to officers of AIW Local 548.

The last meeting between union and management was held Nov. 6, when the company stuck to a previous offer to raise wages 6 cents an hour in a one-year contract, and persisted in denying seniority to those who walked out nearly nine months ago.

The major stumbling block in the path of settlement is the company's importation of strikebreakers through a professional contractor, according to George Woods of Fort Smith, an AIW regional representative.

Recruited on both sides of the border, the strikebreakers are offered $2 an hour to work in the struck foundry. They are brought here, housed in bunks inside the plant, and escorted out only to have their laundry done and do some shopping at a store not too far away.

Most of the imported workers cannot speak English. Some have told union officials that their $2 hourly pay is sliced by sizable deductions for transportation costs, a $15 fee for a supposed physical examination, and for gloves and other equipment.

To fill the foundry force of 80 workers, some 300 to 250 men have been brought in. They slip out a few at a time and return to the border.

Most of the imported workers are unaware of the strike until they reach the job. One Mexican worker, Lazaro Garza, was killed in July when a grinding wheel broke and portions were imbedded in his body. His death so upset the others that many left to hitchhike their way back home.

The AIW provided funds to assist 26 of the unwilling strikebreakers to return, Woods said.

Some of them told their story to El Manana, a newspaper published at Reynosa, Mexico, across the Rio Grande River from McAllen, Texas. The newspaper called their plight "an inhuman exploitation." Since that time there have been other injuries in the plant.

AIW Regional Dir. Boyd Shinn said union officers have asked federal, state and local officials to discourage the housing of strikebreakers. He reported these results:

- James Gutensohn, U.S. attorney in Fort Smith, said he is "aware" of the situation but federal agencies have not reported finding any law violations in the foundry.
- Deputy Sheriff Stan Hall of Sebastian county has accompanied Border Patrol officers to the plant on visits and found all work permits appear to be in order. Hall reported seeing from 25 to 30 workers living in quarters "like an Army barracks."

Philadelphia Teachers Ratify Strike-Won Pact

Philadelphia—A new contract providing more than $34 million in benefits for 16,000 public school teachers over a two-year period was approved by a 5-1 vote of Local 3 of the American Federation of Teachers.

The settlement ends a dispute that had delayed the opening of schools in September and closed them for three days in October. While it lasted, the dispute involved the schools, the courts and Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R), who sought to mediate the first strike in the history of the nation's fourth largest school system.

AFT Vice Pres. John Ryan, chief negotiator for Local 3, told newsmen the annual increase in the new contract will average $1,050. The first payment was deferred to next September to give the School Board time to raise the money.

Elsewhere on the collective bargaining front, 1,000 of the 1,700 teachers in the Hartford, Conn., schools walked out after working without a contract for two weeks. The issues include higher wages, an effective grievance procedure, size of classes, the length of the school day and the school board's attempt to bargain directly with teachers instead of with their union, AFT Rep. Joseph Cascella said.

In East St. Louis, Ill., where 750 teachers have been on strike since Aug. 30, the AFT named a new negotiating committee to resume bargaining with school officials. The committee includes Executive Dir. Oscar Weil of the Illinois AFT.

In Brevard County, Fla., the Brevard Junior College AFT filed suit in the State Circuit Court asking for an order requiring trustees to recognize the union and bargain with it for 189 faculty members.

Trade Act Aid Approved for 2 New Groups

The Labor Dept. has certified approximately 100 piano workers at the D. H. Baldwin Co. plant in Cincinnati for trade adjustment assistance because they lost their jobs due to imports.

The petition for assistance was filed last August by the Steelworkers, who represent the affected employes.

All assembly operations at the Baldwin plant were shut down in August. But significant layoffs occurred in May and June as the plant cut back production of grand pianos.

The Labor Dept. certification provides that all hourly workers who lost their jobs or became under employed after May 9 are eligible to apply for adjustment assistance under provisions of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962.

Adjustment assistance will also be allowed for 130 Auto Workers at the American Motors Corp. soft-trim plant at Wyoming, Mich., who were displaced by increased imports.

The Wyoming plant supplied the seat upholstery, door trim and other similar material for the AMC assembly plant in Kenosha, Wis. The material is now being produced by the AMC soft-trim plant in Canada.

Auto Workers at the Wyoming plant who were affected by the imports after Jan. 3 are certified eligible for adjustment assistance by the Labor Dept.

All the workers at Baldwin and AMC who were affected by the imports must meet certain provisions to be eligible for the assistance. They must have been employed for six months out of the year prior to their layoffs and must have been gainfully employed at least half of the previous three years, the Labor Dept. said.

Adjustment assistance for workers under the Trade Act provides for cash readjustment allowances, testing, counseling, training, job placement and relocation if needed. Cash benefits of up to $85 a week are allowed, but not exceeding 65 percent of the national average weekly wage in manufacturing.

Court Urged to Uphold Bargaining for Retirees

when PPG appealed a 1969 NLRB order to bargain with the union over health plan changes affecting current workers and retirees. The company had been willing to bargain with the union over benefits for current employes but insisted on bargaining individually with the retirees.

Three appeals judges, in an opinion written by Judge Anthony J. Celebrezze, former secretary of Health, Education & Welfare and former mayor of Cleveland, ruled that retired workers and pensioners are no longer employes, as defined by the Taft-Hartley law.

An employer, they said, has no legal duty to bargain with the union over benefits for retirees. The judges held that retirees do not remain part of the union bargaining unit in spite of the fact that active employes are "vitally affected" by the negotiation of retirement benefits.

The AFL-CIO told the Supreme Court in its brief that the legal question had been "erroneously decided" by the appeals court.

It said "the nature of the subject matter demands that bargaining over retirement benefits be a continuous process. The lower court's opinion, however, creates an artificial restriction on bargaining which will have a substantial adverse practical impact on labor-management negotiations" in this area.

The brief called the decision unsound because it relieved the employer of bargaining with the union on the ground that the result of the bargaining would have an impact on other persons.

It said that if this view gains acceptance, "countless subjects of discussion important to labor and management will be removed from the bargaining table if either side declines to discuss it, thereby narrowing the scope of the bargaining to a point at which the ultimate aims" of the law would be thwarted.

Since the PPG decision by the labor board, two NLRB examiners have followed the board's lead instead of the lower court's position. They ordered two companies to bargain with unions over retiree benefits — Westinghouse Electric Corp., Pittsburgh, with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the Union Carbide Corp.-Linde Division with Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in Tonawanda, N.Y.

Senior Citizens Ask Nursing Home Probe

Congress should investigate the growing use of tranquilizer drugs on nursing home patients who do not require this type of medication, according to Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Tranquilizers are used as "chemical straightjackets" to make patients easier to handle, Cruikshank charged in letters to House Speaker John W. McCormack and House Rules Committee Chairman William M. Colmer.

The senior citizens' organization is seeking the support of McCormack and Colmer for a resolution by Congressman David H. Pryor (D-Ark.) calling for the establishment of a select committee to inquire into the quality of care in nursing homes. Improper use of tranquilizers would be one of the areas of inquiry.

Drug manufacturers who foster improper use of tranquilizer drugs were also denounced by Cruikshank. He cited as an example a three-page advertisement by Roche Laboratories in the October issue of Physicians Management magazine.

The ad tells how Valium, a strong tranquilizer, creates a "less complaining patient, less demanding patient, more cooperative patient" and advises that dosage is to be "increased gradually as needed and tolerated."

"Exclusive use of tranquilizers can quickly reduce an ambulatory patient to a zombie, confining the patient to a chair or bed, causing the patient's muscles to atrophy from inaction and causing general health to deteriorate quickly," Cruikshank asserted.

Government Employes Win Big Defense Unit

Philadelphia—Workers at the big Defense Supply Agency here voted for the American Federation of Government Employes in an election to choose a bargaining representative.

The vote was 1,385 for AFGE Local 62, 1,001 votes for the unaffiliated National Association of Government Employes, and 77 no union ballots.

Local 62 Pres. Frank L. Lakis and AFGE National Vice Pres. Royal L. Sims led the campaign.

Rail Unionist Named To Mediation Staff

The National Mediation Board announced the appointment of Robert J. Cerjan of Euclid, O., to the board's staff of mediators. Cerjan has been a field organizer for the United Transportation Union and a predecessor union, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

'Substantial' Wage Boosts:

Steelworkers Shape Contract Objectives

Pittsburgh—The wage policy committee of the Steelworkers called unanimously for contract improvements that will give the union's 1.2 million members the wages and conditions they "deserve and need" in 1970 and 1971.

The 163-member committee set general negotiating goals to be made more specific later by union committees in the basic steel, aluminum, can, container and other industries. The policy committee called for contract updating that will include "very substantial" wage boosts, restoration of the cost-of-living escalator removed from steel contracts 11 years ago, a shorter work week without pay cuts, and improvements in existing pension, vacation, holiday, safety and health, and job security programs.

The union's three-year contracts with the basic steel industry expire next Aug. 1. Other contracts expire at intervals through this year and next.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel told a press conference here that the policy committee, consisting of the three top USWA officers, 25 union directors and 135 delegates from locals across the United States and Canada set the contract goals in two days of meetings and voted unanimously to send them to industry conferences for implementation.

"These are the changes we will be seeking in our 1970 and 1971 negotiations," Abel said.

In answer to questions by newsmen, Abel declared "our people have had enough" of tight money, constantly rising prices and diminishing purchasing power of their hard-earned dollars.

The steel industry and its workers, he said, have in the past been the "fall guys" singled out to "hold the line" on prices and wages.

Wage-price guidelines imposed earlier in the decade on steel employers and employes "haven't worked," Abel told questioners. Further, the Steelworkers — far from causing inflation — have been the victims of it, he observed.

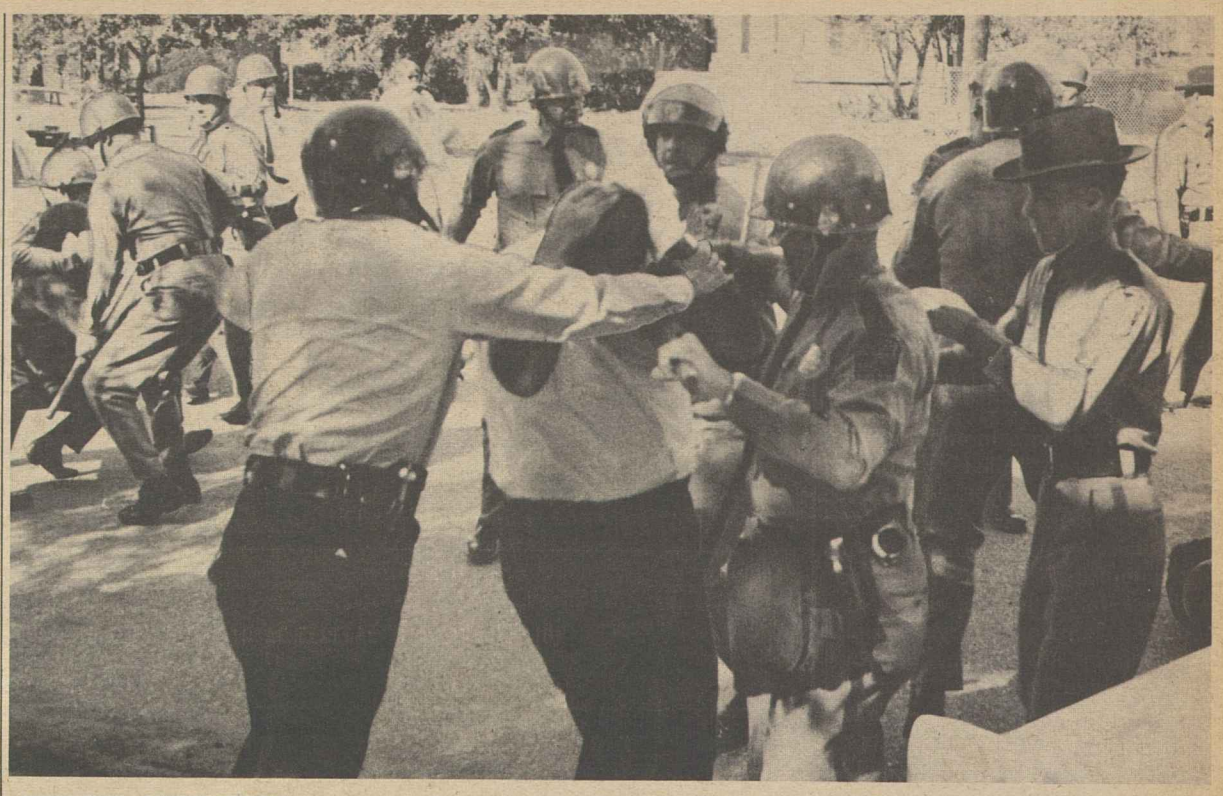
"We have made our contribution to a stable economy," Abel said.

The policy committee emphasized the need of Steelworkers for the key objectives of wages, pensions and a cost-of-living clause in industry contracts.

Wages—"Rampant inflation" requires "bold action" including a catch-up wage increase to reduce the effects of past inflation, additional increases large enough to produce real pay gains, a cost-of-living clause to shield wages from future inflation, and an upward adjustment of the pay bases used in calculating incentive pay.

Pensions—Benefits must be "dramatically increased" and eligibility further liberalized so that "full pension, regardless of age, following stipulated years of service, should be universal." Funding provisions should be strengthened and "stringent" protection provided against fund manipulation in the case of "conglomerate takeover and other corporate maneuvering."

Insurance—Hospital and medical benefits should be liberalized and greater emphasis put on broadened mental care coverage, drug, dental care and related benefits.



On non-economic issues, the policy committee said the current system of handling plant grievances has become overburdened, slow, costly and is "in danger of collapse." Should this occur, it said, "the union may well be confronted with the difficult and costly use of the strike as an alternative to the more desirable procedures that have been carefully constructed."

It said "such a course would be a last resort only if other measures fail."

Abel said he has "a lot of hope" that the basic steel industry will agree to a four-day work week because "if we in this country are to achieve full employment and a healthy economy, we must reduce our work week."

He added: "I believe the industry and the government can afford to do it."

The committee delegates, he noted, displayed a mood of "determination to achieve equity" for members and "if necessary to engage in a strike." Abel said there has been no strike in basic steel since 1959 and "I hope one won't be necessary next year."

POLICE VIOLENCE against striking Steelworkers in Georgetown, S.C., ended with more than a dozen strikers injured, many requiring hospital treatment. The police waded into a march following a strike rally near the Bethel Methodist Church. More than 500 black and white workers have been out on strike since Aug. 15 following the refusal of the German-owned Georgetown Steel Co. to bargain in good faith with the union.

Actors' Equity Strikes Off-Broadway Theaters

New York—Actors and actresses in 17 off-Broadway theaters are playing new roles, the real-life roles of union members on strike.

Angus Duncan, executive secretary of Actors' Equity, said picket lines stretching below 14th St. and north of 72nd St. are "100 percent effective."

The walkout by some 200 players and stage managers is over money and safe and sanitary working conditions, Equity said. It is the first strike by the union against off-Broadway theaters.

Equity is asking a minimum wage of $125 a week for actors, rising to $130 a week plus cost-of-living increases after three years. The current minimum is $75 a week for shows that gross less than $4,500 a week. Stage managers get more.

For shows with receipts of up to $12,500 a week, the union proposed wages rising on a sliding scale up to $405 a week. Management's last counter-proposal was a $90 weekly minimum for the first year, $92.50 for the second year and $95 the third for the less prosperous theaters, up to $170 a week for attractions grossing up to $12,500.

All the theaters involved are in areas not bordering Times Square, and all have fewer than 300 seats. The union extended its contract for two weeks after the scheduled expiration date of Nov. 1. It finally gave the word for the walkout when producers said they could not afford to meet the union members' proposals.

Sixteen of the theaters went dark when the actors struck. A 17th failed to open—the Actors' Playhouse. It was to have marked the debut of Actress Shelley Winters as a playright in "One Night Stands of a Noisy Passenger."

The off-Broadway theater is described this way by Duncan:

"Off-Broadway meant that originally actors were willing to work for peanuts—$25 or $40 a week—so they could perform in interesting old plays or challenging new ones. The box office gross, if the play was a success, hovered around $2,000 or $3,000 and the price of a ticket was under $5.

"Today the price of a ticket is up to $10 and the whole concept has changed from experimentation to big business. . . . The landlord must recognize that the actor must get his just share."

Equity Pres. Frederick O'Neal described the off-Broadway theater as one where many acting aspirants get their first stage experience. Some will work for little or nothing to have a part on the stage.

"To the actor, visibility is everything," O'Neal said in a recent interview. "A painter can work in a garret and produce masterpieces. But an actor is a nobody going nowhere until he or she has an audience."

For that reason, the union devised the off-Broadway contract to give a reasonable measure of protection to the newcomer without destroying his chance for getting experience, he said.

German Firm Battles Union At U.S. Plant

Georgetown, S.C.—After winning a stunning election victory at the first foreign-owned steel mill in the United States, the Steelworkers are fighting for a first contract at the Georgetown Steel Corp. here.

The union won the election last April by a 376 to 89 vote. But the German owners of the plant, Korf Industries and Hendel GMBH & Co., have refused to "bargain seriously" since then, the USWA said.

About 500 workers have been out on strike against the firm since Aug. 15 and recently tensions have been mounting. On Nov. 7 the workers—they are both black and white—held a rally at the Bethel Methodist Church in Georgetown.

As they left the church to begin a march, police waded into the crowd. More than a dozen workers were clubbed and beaten and required hospital treatment.

The rally was followed by another at which the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, pledged his support, along with national USWA leaders.

National attention was focused on the union election last April because the new $30-million foreign "mini-steel" plant was the first to set up operations in this country. The German company said it had deliberately located in a "right-to-work" state where cheap labor would be available. The owners have been considering a second plant in the Gulf Coast area near New Orleans. The Georgetown mill was formally dedicated on the eve of the NLRB election and Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) was among the prominent guests.

Ironically, the firm which left Germany because of problems with competitors sent workers a standard anti-union love letter during the election campaign. It warned the South Carolinians to beware of the "outsiders" from the union.

Road Workers Win Long Strike As Voters Oust Balky Commission

Oakland, Md.—Garrett County road workers have won a 227-day strike for recognition of their union—Local 1834 of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The union signed an agreement with three new county commissioners whereby the strikers were to vote on union representation Nov. 20 before they return to work. The commissioners, sworn in Nov. 17, have agreed to recognize the union if it receives a majority of votes.

"The election results are a foregone conclusion," said Local 1834 Pres. Wellington Jack Sowers. "After seven months of striking, we've all made up our minds exactly how we're going to vote."

The strike began last Apr. 7 when more than 130 workers walked out in support of their demand for union recognition. Two conservative Republicans on the board of commissioners steadfastly blocked recognition and refused even to talk with union representatives. A new slate of commissioners, all Democrats, was elected Nov. 3.

Sowers said the strike was an "uphill grind" all the way. He extended thanks to other SCME locals in California, Wisconsin, New York, Ohio and Maryland that sent donations of money, food and clothing.

Sowers said there were no defections from the strike, which was the longest walkout of public employes in the history of American labor.

The agreement states that the county commissioners will begin negotiating a contract with Local 1834 immediately. The county agreed that the dues checkoff would be implemented, that strikers would receive full restoration of seniority and that there would be no reprisals against any of the strikers.

Upon their return to work, the men will receive a 7 percent wage increase that was included in the county's budget during the strike. In addition, the workers will now receive overtime pay rates after eight hours a day or 40 hours a week as opposed to the compensatory time-off provisions in effect before the strike.

No work has been performed on the 800 miles of Garrett County roadway since the strike began, and county roads are pock-marked with potholes as western Maryland faces a typically severe winter. Sowers said the men would have some of the road equipment running in two days.

SCME Vice Pres. Ernest B. Crofoot of Baltimore was part of the negotiating committee that reached the agreement.

"It was a complete victory for the union," said Crofoot. "The new commissioners displayed statesmanship. It was obvious that there was a frank desire to get this thing over with and get the men back to work."

Texas U. Students Aid Union Victory

Austin, Tex.—Students of the University of Texas helped win an election for a union here at two stores of the University Cooperative Society, Inc.

Some store employes are part-time university students; others are former students. The employes appealed to the Texas AFL-CIO for help in getting organized, and the result was an election petition by the Service Employes.

The union won the election among 206 employes, and was certified as the winner after a 106-74 favorable vote. SEIU chartered the group as Local 632 and the first meeting was held on the university campus. New officers include acting Pres. John Fox and Treas. Neta Reed, who are getting ready to submit contract proposals.

The stores sell books, school supplies, clothing and pharmacy items.

For a Fair Fight

BACK BEFORE 1933, lame duck sessions of Congress were routine every other year. Then the Constitution was amended and the problem of having men who were defeated at the polls voting on national legislation was fairly well put to rest.

Twenty years ago there was a lame duck session but Congress has managed to conduct its business in the intervening years without a post-election session.

Now the 91st Congress is back in session after an especially bitter and angry election campaign and some of the after-effects are spilling over into the legislative process.

Unfortunately most of the attention is currently focused on the political mood and the post-election crosscurrents instead of the long list of unfinished business.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last week called national attention to that agenda which contains a wide range of legislative problems affecting all Americans. There are no "labor" issues as such on the list.

It would be better perhaps for the bills, the nominations, the constitutional amendments to be considered at a regular session when there is greater attendance and a more leisurely pace. But the problems require solution now, not a year from now.

TAKE, FOR EXAMPLE, the political broadcast bill, a measure passed by wide margins by Congress but vetoed by the President. The question of the moment is whether Congress will override the veto. And the timing is important in terms of the 1972 election and the drawing of plans and strategy.

The 1970 election campaigns demonstrated the urgent need for the measure, which the AFL-CIO Executive Council said Pres. Nixon vetoed for "political reasons." Nothing has shaken public confidence more than "the demonstrated ability of a rich candidate to smother an opponent of more modest means in the floods of purchased radio and TV propaganda," the council noted.

It added that the result "has been to create serious and entirely justified fears that public office in America may soon be barred to all save the rich, or those with wealthy supporters."

Nearly every organization with a stake in the effective functioning of our political system—including the professional political managers, poll-takers and media technicians—are in agreement that the Congress-passed measure to control political spending on radio and television is an important step in placing a meaningful ceiling on a significant portion of campaign expenditures.

The President's veto message falls back on lame and limited reasoning. The essential fact is that limits on radio and television spending will have a more direct and immediate effect on the free and heavy-spending Republican Party than on any other group.

The 1970 elections demonstrated how the dollar-greased radio-TV campaign can become both politically subversive and offensive. A reasonable, intelligent control of such spending is a first step toward making a political campaign a fair fight.

U. S. Proposal for Cease-Fire Defuses Viet Nam Controversy

By John P. Roche

WHAT EVER HAPPENED to the war in Viet Nam? About a year ago, the conventional liberal wisdom was that Viet Nam would be the political issue in 1970; and last May, everyone seemed to think that the election would be a referendum on Cambodia. As you may recall—and I will take the liberty of stimulating your memories—I thought this was risky nonsense. Risky because it made liberal Democrats appear to have "a vested interest in catastrophe" in Southeast Asia; nonsense because the American people are a lot smarter than we sometimes give them credit for.

Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon faced the same problem in terms of public opinion on the war. If you examine the make-up of the "real majority," you find a melange of conflicting views: First, traditional patriotism, a basic conviction that the United States can not, and should not, be—in Pres. Nixon's word—"humiliated" by Hanoi. Second, a strong dislike of war, not pacifism so much as isolationism, a feeling that we shouldn't be messing around all over the place. And third, a vigorous distaste for the rhetoric and actions of the anti-war militants.

The first task of the President of the United States had to be a massive job of educating the electorate on our goals in Southeast Asia. From his perspective, Lyndon Johnson in 1965-67 believed that the big task was to contain the "hawks," that is, neutralize the voices demanding all-out war, invasion of North Viet Nam, even nuclear weapons. He had good reason to worry about this—after all, in the 1964 election, Barry Goldwater did get 40 percent of the votes, an indication that 27 million Americans were in fairly bellicose spirits.

Johnson chose to play the war down—in 1965 he refused to call up reserves, ask for tax increases, or even request special funding. He refused to sound the trumpet for fear that the wrong army would respond, that right-wingers would move in and use the war as a pretext for undermining the Great Society.

But in protecting his right flank, the President exposed his left; suddenly he found himself beset by peaceniks who—instead of appreciating his fine work in holding back the "hawks"—denounced him in season and out because there was any war at all. Refusing to make the eagle scream, and incapable of shifting his defenses from the right to the left, the President was boxed in. And having initially down-played the war for tactical reasons, he found himself facing "credibility" crises every time he had to ask for more money, more men, more equipment.

He was caught in a self-gambit and, I confess, my heart went out to him. Had he been less concerned with liberal political values, more willing to beat the patriotic drum, he would not have ended up in this trap. He got clobbered for my principles.

MR. NIXON has no such problems, and he has moved effectively to defuse Southeast Asia as a political issue. Recognizing that most of those whom the polls list as "anti-Viet Nam" are patriotic isolationists—who want to get out without losing—the President by his constant emphasis on Vietnamization and, most spectacularly, in his stand-still cease-fire proposal, has isolated that segment of the American anti-war movement which can best be described not as "doves" but as "Hanoi hawks." That is, they are not for peace in Viet Nam, but for a Hanoi victory.

How can anyone who wants peace denounce a stand-still cease-fire? The way to stop the war is obviously to stop the shooting. The Hanoi hawks, however, cannot accept this proposition because their definition of peace is a North Vietnamese victory over the Saigon government. So back they come, time and again, attacking the President's trickery and demanding an immediate American withdrawal and a "coalition government."

Back they come to an empty house—in case you didn't know it, October 15 and 31 were billed as the dates of a great national anti-war strike. I saw no stories at all about the 15th; but on the 31st, 250 militants drifted in to the Boston Common and 1,000 showed up in New York (I have seen more than a thousand people at a three-alarm fire in Brooklyn).

Perhaps we have finally come to the end of the era of hysterics and can place Viet Nam in sensible perspective rather than treating it as the central crisis of American politics. Let us hope so.

Needs of Nation's Workers Key To Strategy for 1972 Elections

The following editorial, "Politics and the Pay Envelope," appeared in the Nov. 15 issue of Justice, the official publication of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

THE ASSURING QUALITY of American life is its rich variety. This accounts for the fact that with few exceptions it changes course without the sudden jolts desired by those who would pull it sharply to one side of the road or the other. Early this month this was true, even though it was the President of the United States himself who did the heaving and the hauling.

The Republican Administration headed by Mr. Nixon came out of the election campaign with less than it had going into it. As head of the party, Mr. Nixon chose to put the prestige of his high office on the line. Convinced that he had defined the issue that would swing the country sharply to his party's side—and provide the strength in the Congress he could not muster two years ago when he was elected—the President stumped the country.

He pinpointed incumbents who were his special targets for defeat. Through the Vice President, a roster of "radical liberals" was unrolled with the intent of picturing the opposing party as being tolerant of drugs, crime, riots and pornography. Facing roaring crowds in stadiums throughout the land the President, with body and fingers making the sign of victory, called for the silent majority to rise up and be counted.

AFTER THEY HAD risen up and been counted, the Republicans found they had picked up only two Senate seats. But in the House, the Democrats strengthened their hold with a gain of nine seats. Biggest gain for the Democrats was in their sweep of the gubernatorial contests—essential to building their party strength—by putting 13 Republican governors out of office and re-establishing the Democratic majority hold on state capitals in the nation.

The mixed character of the results is clear. But even the election of a Conservative senator from New York reflected Republican strength less than it did the role of the state's Liberal party. Its insistent splitting of the liberal vote cleared the way. Only half of the marginal vote it pulled for the Republican candidate it favored was sufficient to ensure the Conservative victory—and the defeat of a liberal Democrat.

The Republicans broke all records for an off-year election with their swollen campaign funds and spending. The Vice President rode circuit spreading the alarm that the country could be saved only by a Republican Congress. Worst of all, the President jeopardized the dignity and prestige of his office with cheer-leader tactics that have now earned him a credibility gap.

The causes of his setback are the overriding worries that now gnaw daily at the lives of most Americans. While they are genuinely fearful of campus unrest and the spread of disaffection and even violence among some of the nation's youth, American workers clearly believe that the basic cynicism eroding American ideals arises from the Administration's failing to deal with fundamental challenges.

The issues raised by the President and the Vice President were so blatantly designed to distract the nation from its present economic dilemmas as to lose much of their vote-getting power even where Republicans were most anxious to win. In 20 months in office the Nixon Administration has little to show for its election-time promises to beat back violence, crime, campus depravity and other evils more properly in the realm of police action by the states.

On the other hand, it has a lot to account for in the continuing decline in jobs, wages, purchasing power; the continuing rise in unemployment, medical costs, interest rates, and inflation. And it is to these evils that it must now address itself if it has at all heard the message the people of this nation sent on Election Day.

THAT MESSAGE was loud and clear: In the majority of the states where the President and the Vice President campaigned long and extensively against labor's friends, the Republicans were roundly repudiated, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has pointed out.

Much of our general executive board meeting earlier this month was concerned with these urgent issues. In reports from all sections and garment centers in the country, it was clear that the garment industry was being hurt most by the economic recession, rising imports and fashion uncertainty—and in that order.

Ours is a most sensitive industry, as we have noted often enough. And it is most sensitive to the readiness of women to spend for themselves and their families in order to purchase apparel. The economic policies of the Republican Administration have continuously eaten away at their confidence and they have hesitated in their spending.

In the end it is the people who went to the polls and spelled it out. Our own members in the ILGWU, and millions of other trade unionists, were in the vanguard in pointing the way. As Pres. Stulberg emphasized, we must beware of fakirs on the left as well as on the right and steer our course as we head toward 1972 not by the dictates of special interests, but by the needs of this nation's workers.

U.S.-Based Firms Blamed:

Loss of 400,000 Jobs in U. S. Tied to Outdated Trade Policy

A FLOODTIDE OF IMPORTS and a restricted export market have cut more than 400,000 jobs from the U.S. economy since 1966, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger charged in a network radio interview program.

Congress has to "face up to the realities" of a "substantially changed world economic situation," declared Goldfinger. He stressed that about half of "what goes by the name of American foreign trade" actually comes from overseas subsidiaries of U.S. parent companies operating with foreign firms under patent and license agreements. He cited textiles, clothing, steel, automobile, glass, electronics and appliances as among the industries most seriously affected by such operations.

Goldfinger said that although wage rates in U.S. parent overseas operations are only a fraction of those the same companies pay their workers here, the resulting imports don't always mean a better break for American consumers. The basic issue is usually profit and greed, with wider margins for the importing firm or the international company based in the United States, he said.

In the process, he declared, "workers lose out . . . and the consumer gets very little, if any, benefit." He noted the rise of shoe imports "from almost nothing in 1960 . . . to about one-third of the U.S. domestic market" last year. "Despite this very sharp rise of shoe imports," he asserted, "shoe prices increased more than 46 percent . . . at a much faster rate than the overall consumer price index."

THE LABOR ECONOMIST said he doubts that U.S. import quotas would trigger a "trade war or retaliation" by other countries.

"These are scare terms thrown out to the American public and to the Congress" by the multi-national companies that "want the best of all possible worlds to protect their own selfish interests," he declared.

The AFL-CIO doesn't advocate shutting off imports, he declared, but only "some kind of reasonable, realistic lid on the amount of imports, in any product line, coming into the United States."

Goldfinger appeared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System. He was interviewed by Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES' membership may get more of a shake-up by the next election than most observers seem to realize.

In 1962 the Supreme Court issued its first "one-man, one-vote" decision. Part of its ruling decreed that congressional districts must be as nearly equal in population as possible.

The population figure is based on the census data accumulated at the beginning of each decade. The 1962 decision, then, was based on the 1960 census.

The 1972 election will be the first based on the just-completed 1970 census data. Shifts in population will affect the 93rd Congress in several ways:

- Six states will gain additional seats in the Congress and 10 states will lose seats, and
- Twenty-three other states will redistrict since their present districts are unequal in population.

Under accepted procedure, the legislatures of the several states will redraw the district lines. The governor has the power to veto the redistricting plan. If the differences between the governor and the legislatures cannot be resolved, the disagreement could well end up in the courts. And if no judicial decision is given, all members of the House from the state may be forced to run at large.

Obviously, the states which gain or lose seats will feel the impact of redistricting to the greatest degree.

The biggest single shift affects California which gains five seats. Republicans had confidently expected to have a field day in carving up the state. However, a Democratic victory in gaining control of the legislature leaves only Gov. Reagan in position to try to achieve compromise in the redistricting plan.

Perhaps the most startling change was in Pennsylvania where Democrats took both the state house and the legislature away from the Republicans. The state loses two seats in 1972.

On the other hand, New York, which also loses two seats, is entirely controlled by the Republicans.

According to the latest results, the Democrats appear to have gained control of 24 state legislatures and the Republicans 16.

As far as governorships are concerned, Democrats held 18 state houses before the election. Today the Democrats won or appear to have won 29.

IN MANY STATES which do not gain or lose congressional seats sharp population shifts have taken place. We find that despite "one-man, one-vote," the sizes of congressional districts now vary from 704,004 in Maryland's 5th District outside Washington to the 2nd District of Idaho which has 308,358.

Two redistricting cases reached the Supreme Court in 1969 which gives us some idea of the kind of yardstick which must be used in carving out districts.

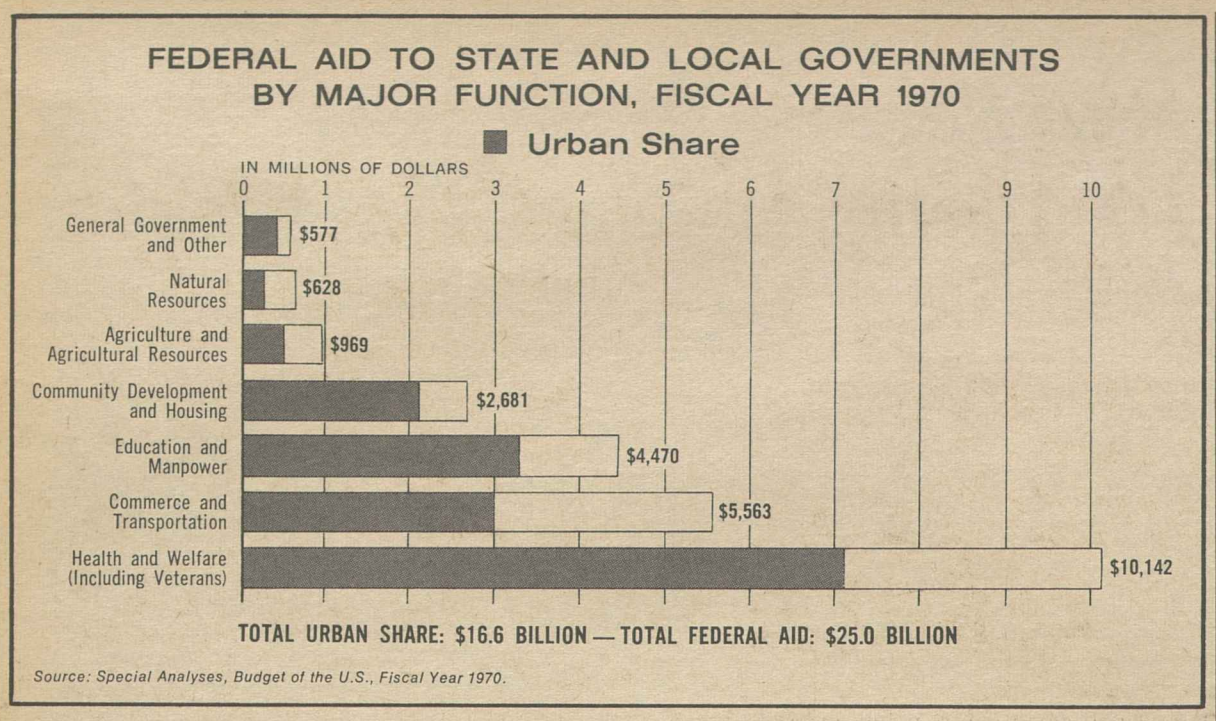
Missouri had a variance of 3.1 percent in congressional districts based on the 1960 census. This was ruled unconstitutional. The Missouri legislature passed another redistricting measure where the difference between districts was only 1,357 persons. This won the court's approval.



New York enacted a redistricting bill with a population difference between the largest and smallest districts of only 803 persons.

The court's total concern was population equity. It did not recognize so-called "gerrymandering" of districts. New York was the most extreme example of this tactic. Some districts sprawled all over the state just to give Republicans the advantage. The high court refused to rule on this and a number of Democrats lost their seats in the 1970 elections.

The Supreme Court did not entirely close the door on "gerrymandering" after the 1970 census and elections. The net result, though, should be considerable changes and new faces in the 93rd Congress.

SURGING IMPORTS and lagging exports have cost the U.S. economy 400,000 jobs since 1966, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, declared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview were Philip Shabecoff, left, of the New York Times and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

'No-Strings' Federal Funds Held No Answer to City, State Needs

Mayors and governors are looking to the federal government to close the big and growing gap between revenue and expenditures—between bills that have to be paid for services that have to be provided and the money that is available to pay them.

An article in the November issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine, urges that the federal government's already-large payouts to states and cities be further increased.

But the article, by AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor, stresses that a "no-strings" revenue-sharing plan is not the answer.

Cantor notes that the federal government paid out $25 billion to help local governments meet public needs during the last fiscal year. About 70 percent of the money went to urban areas where the needs were most critical.

Nevertheless, Cantor says, "the federal government's role as anchorman in the nation's three-level federal system needs strengthening."

He warns, however, that the "no-strings" Administration proposal to pass on a portion of federal tax receipts to the states, bypassing the regular federal legislative and appropriations process, could actually hamper the nation's ability to provide needed public services and facilities.

"Such revenue sharing is not a magical new concept," he notes. "It will not create money where none now exists."

The present federal method of revenue sharing centers on the grants-in-aid programs that have proved successful over the years. However, this system has its critics, Cantor notes, and some feel that a portion of federally-collected funds should flow back to the states automatically with no conditions as to purpose or program.

"The states would be free to do what they please with the money," he points out, in contrast to federal funds that are given to cities or states for use in specific purposes or projects that serve the nation's interests.

The aid programs are established by Congress through the normal process of legislation, authorization and appropriation. And the state or local governments receiving the funds must use the money for the purpose intended by Congress. They also must agree to certain performance conditions such as civil rights and labor standards, the article stresses.

These grants finance a number of major programs, including manpower training, low-rent public housing, urban renewal, elementary and secondary education, hospital and highway construction.

"In only a decade, direct federal financial aid to states, counties, municipalities and school districts has more than tripled—rising from $7 billion in 1960 to an estimated $25 billion in the year ended June 30, 1970," Cantor notes.

"Virtually all of this aid is in the formal of categorical grants-in-aid which in 1970 will account for 99 percent of the federal money flowing to the states and communities," he adds.

About $16.6 billion of the $25 billion was granted to the cities, which have been hit hard by the impact of population shifts and shrinking revenue income since the end of World War II, Cantor reports.

Under the no-strings revenue-sharing plan proposed by the Administration the cities would be short-changed, Cantor stresses.

Starting with a kitty of $500 million in fiscal 1971, the fund proposed by the Administration would rise to $5 billion by 1976. But this $5 billion will represent less than 3 percent of the projected levels of state and local expenditures in that year, the AFL-CIO economist notes.

"At the same time, the states would receive 70 percent of the funds, the local share would be only 30 percent to be split among every county, city and township government—large or small," Cantor observes.

The current grants-in-aid system is not error-free either, the article notes. It suffers from overlapping programs and administrative difficulties.

"Four separate programs aid water and sewer projects," Cantor points out, "and they are administered by a like number of agencies."

He suggests that efforts should be made to centralize and coordinate the federal aid programs. He also urges improvements in communications to let state and local government administrators know the number of federal aids available.

"There is a marked need to fund existing programs and build into the grant-in-aid system a greater degree of certainty," Cantor declares.

"State and local officials are often limited in their ability to plan expenditures and implement their programs because they are not sure how much federal money will be forthcoming or when it comes, even though the grant-in-aid program is law," he notes.

Fire Prevention Panel Includes Union Leader

Appointment by the President of 18 members of the National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control was hailed by the Fire Fighters as a long-awaited first step toward finding more effective methods of fire prevention.

The White House named David K. Wilson of Nashville, Tenn., as chairman and Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters as vice chairman. Wilson is president of Cherokee Equity Corp., an insurance firm.

Congress in 1968 passed the Fire Research & Safety Act which authorized the commission, and the Fire Fighters have repeatedly urged the White House to implement the law. Last spring, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote Pres. Nixon urging appointment of the committee members.

In his letter, Meany said he was acting on behalf of all AFL-CIO members "and especially the fire fighters of this nation who have their lives at stake on improved fire prevention." With the commission, he pointed out, the President can "begin to insure that all Americans are receiving the maximum in fire prevention and control."

The commission's legislative mandate is to "undertake a comprehensive study and investigation" to find "effective measures for reducing the destructive effects of fires." It has two years to study and report its findings.

Besides the 18 presidential appointees, commission members include the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development. There are four advisory members also, two named by the President of the Senate and two by the Speaker of the House.

McClennan said he hopes members can meet soon to begin work on their assigned task. Organized firemen need help in getting better equipment, better training and education techniques, the establishment of a National Fire Academy and all the aid that modern science can give them, he said.

More than 12,000 Americans were burned to death in fires last year and billions of dollars in fire losses were reported by the National Fire Protection Association, McClennan said.

National Health Plan Seen Closing Gaps

New York—The United States is falling behind every other developed nation in the western world in health care, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman declared, because it "is the only industrialized nation left on earth that does not have a national health program."

Testifying at a public hearing on National Health Insurance conducted by Rep. Martha Griffiths (D-Mich.) as part of a conference of the Consumer Assembly of Greater New York, Seidman said "the crisis in health care has been caused by fundamental inadequacies and gaps in the organization, delivery and financing of health care."

He cited organized medicine and private health insurance as major contributors to the crisis.

Doctors, Seidman stated, "have clung tenaciously to an archaic corner grocery system of piecework, solo practice, fee-for-service medicine." He added that this system "has long since been discarded in all other sectors of our economy."

Seidman listed three alternatives to the present system, which he labeled "disorganized, costly and inefficient":

- Substitution of ambulatory care for often unneeded hospitalization.
- Greater use of paramedical personnel to economize on "the scarce skills of trained professionals."
- Promotion of community-based prepaid group practice plans, which he said "have a proven record of better health care at a lower cost than the prevailing fee-for-service solo practice arrangement."

Private health insurance is also not equal to the challenge, Seidman said. He pointed out that when social insurance programs are turned over to private companies a large portion of the premium dollar goes toward profits and administrative expenses.

"All too often where and how medical services are delivered, and even by whom, is determined by financial, not medical considerations," he continued. "Only where there is fully financed comprehensive care available, as in prepaid group practice plans, can doctors practice medicine on the basis of the health needs of their patients rather than their ability to pay."

Private insurance leaves many gaps in its coverage, Seidman pointed out. Twenty percent or more of the population under 65 is not covered against hospital and surgical costs. More than half have no coverage for office and home visits by physicians.

"Private health insurance has done virtually nothing to influence the quantity, the quality, the efficiency or the cost of the care it has purchased," he stated. Instead, private insurance acts solely as a pass-through mechanism.

Seidman noted that two major bills have been introduced to replace the existing inadequate system of financing health care with a program that will finance and provide comprehensive health care for all—National Health Insurance. The House bill was introduced by Rep. Griffiths, and the Senate bill, similar in intent but with some differences, by Senators Yarborough, Kennedy, Cooper and Saxbe.

The AFL-CIO has endorsed the Griffiths bill, but Seidman said there are provisions in the Senate bill which "deserve serious consideration." He expressed the hope that combining the best provisions of both would produce a better bill.

He criticized the Administration for making no proposals for national health insurance. Instead, he said, the Administration has asked for delay, arguing that transformation of the health delivery system must precede comprehensive financing. Seidman said this approach refuses to recognize the fact "that the system of delivering health care will never be changed under present methods of paying for medical care. The way we finance health care can create the leverage the nation and the medical profession need to bring about a more rational system."

Labor Dept. Forecast:

Big Rise in Young Workers Expected for Next 10 Years

A workforce topping 100 million that the Labor Dept. forecasts for the nation by 1980 will reflect a continuing change in the pattern of occupations and a dramatic increase in the number of younger workers—ages 25 to 34.

While the labor force grows about 20 percent in the decade from the current 86 million, the gross national product will increase about 50 percent to $1.4 trillion, the Labor Dept. predicts.

Employment will continue to shift toward white-collar and service occupations, although a slight increase in the number of blue-collar jobs is anticipated.

The number of women workers will grow from the current 30 million to 37 million, the Labor Dept. concludes in its report titled "U.S. Manpower in the 1970s: Opportunity and Challenge."

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said the report will give a clearer understanding of the coming changes in the occupational structure to the nation's decision makers in business, labor, education and manpower.

The report stresses these key points:

- A dramatic surge in the labor force among workers aged 25 to 34 who will be entering their prime working years with a better education than their counterparts of the '60s.
- A dramatic slowdown in the growth of the teenage labor force that will provide an opportunity to reduce teenage unemployment. But a 43 percent rise of young Negro workers entering the workforce will be more than four times greater than the increase in white teenagers.
- Married women will account for the major portion in the continuing rise of working women that by 1980 will be double the 1950 level.
- White-collar workers will outnumber blue-collar employes by more than 50 percent in 1979.
- Growth in part-time job opportunities. If present trends continue, one of every seven persons will be a part-time worker in 1980.

"In this decade, as in the last, the fastest growing occupations are professional and technical—the ones requiring the most educational preparation," the study says.

The professional-technical jobs are expected to increase 50 percent by 1980 to 15.5 million. Service occupations will rank second in growth with an anticipated increase of 45 percent to 11.1 million.

Clerical workers, with an increase of 35 percent to 17.3 million, will be the largest occupational group, the report predicts.

Further down the anticipated growth scale, the Labor Dept. lists craft skills to show a growth of 22 percent to 12.2 million. Operatives—production line workers, truck drivers and other semi-skilled workers—will increase only 10 percent over the decade to 15.4 million.

Unskilled occupations are expected to decline. Non-farm laborers will drop 2 percent to 3.5 million and farm workers will decline 33 percent to 2.6 million, the study predicts.

The anticipated increase of women in the labor force reflects a major change in American life style, the report states.

This will mean that job training must be available for mothers re-entering the labor force, along with expanded day care facilities for children, Hodgson suggested.

The overall shift in occupational patterns will mean that more education will be needed to compete for available jobs—and conversely, dropouts will find it more difficult to find employment, Hodgson declared.

He also predicted a significant increase in jobs in the housing and construction industries after the end of the Viet Nam war. This would, however, be coupled with a decline in the defense industry, he added.

Employment gains industry-by-industry will be led by the state and local governments, which will increase 52 percent by 1980 to 13.8 million. The services industry, including personal, professional and business, will go up 40 percent to 21.1 million.

Other substantial gains are forecast in construction, up 35 percent to 5.5 million; finance, insurance and real estate, up 24 percent to 4.6 million, and trade, up 23 percent to 20.5 million.

Although manufacturing is expected to increase only 11 percent over the decade to 22.4 million jobs, it will still be the biggest employer in the industries group.

Jobs in agriculture are expected to decline 23 percent to 3.2 million and mining occupations are expected to drop 9 percent to 600,000.

EXPANDING JOB OPPORTUNITIES for the disadvantaged and the underemployed were explored at the national conference of the Human Resources Development Institute in Kansas City. # HRDI Expands Scope Of Manpower Efforts

Kansas City—The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute has begun cultivating a new series of job placement programs while continuing its involvement in existing manpower operations.

The institute's national staff conference here focused on expanded activities in job development and placement in cooperation with AFL-CIO central labor councils and on ways to help returning servicemen find work and necessary training.

Emphasis was also put on the upgrading of workers placed in jobs through HRDI efforts and on various minority training programs for pre-apprentices and journeymen operated by the building trades.

The expanded activities will be financed by a new government contract of $2.2 million effective Dec. 1. HRDI's first contract grant was for $1.5 million.

The institute has operations in 41 key manpower centers that are geared to expand job opportunities for the disadvantaged, underemployed and minorities.

Attending the conference were the 45 HRDI field representatives and the national staff, led by Institute Pres. Julius Rothman and Dir. Robert M. McGlotten.

Addressing the conference, Assistant Labor Sec. Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., told the representatives that the best chance for success in the government's manpower training programs lies in working with organized labor.

Lovell stressed the need for "rational liberalism" and "quiet vigor in the pursuit of equality" in seeking employment opportunities for minority group members, the unemployed and the underemployed.

HRDI plans to set up five job development and placement programs in cooperation with central labor councils and local unions. The first is expected to be operational within a month and the other four will be developed at 30-day intervals.

These programs call for the placement in meaningful jobs of 20 persons a month in each city at area wage levels and labor standards.

Returning veterans will also be assisted by HRDI local offices in finding jobs and training. A special effort will be made to help veterans who indicate an interest in the building trades by placement in Apprenticeship Outreach programs or other appropriate training.

HRDI will also continue to assist building trades councils in the operation of Outreach programs in 20 cities and journeymen training projects in 15 cities.

Under its new contract, HRDI goals are to place at least 500 minority group youths as apprentices in the building trades and assist another 2,000 minority workers in training and placement as full-status journeymen.

The conference also explored steps to expand HRDI technical assistance to international unions in the development of job training programs.

Labor Dept. Ruling Curbs Admiral, Upholds Union Rights at Navy Yard

The Executive Order of the President on employer-employe relations in the federal service takes precedence over directives of the Defense Dept. and Civil Service Commission, the Labor Dept. ruled.

The ruling, by Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., in a dispute between the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council and the admiral commanding the Charleston, S.C., Naval Shipyard, was the first of its kind since the President gave Usery power to settle disputes under the order, subject only to a limited right of appeal to the Federal Labor Relations Council.

At issue was the right of union members to distribute union printed matter, solicit union membership, or to leave work to perform the duties of a union steward.

The shipyard commander, Admiral C. M. Payne, issued an order prohibiting such activity early this year when an unaffiliated union began campaigning for the right to represent the yard's 5,000 blue collar employes, long represented by the Federal Employes Metal Trades Council and the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

The metal trades challenged the order and Hearing Examiner Frederick U. Reel concluded that the shipyard's directives to stop "electioneering" by either side were unfair labor practices and should be withdrawn.

Usery upheld the examiner in part but disagreed with his reliance on language similarities between the Executive Order and the National Labor Relations Act.

Usery ordered shipyard management to stop interfering with the rights of its employes to engage in union activity so long as such activity does not cause safety problems or unduly disturb yard functions.

Metal Trades Council officers headed by Pres. Maywood Boggs and Sec.-Treas. Clayton Bilderback called Usery's ruling "a victory for freedom of speech of federal employes."

Since the dispute started, metal trades unions have continued to represent their Charleston members and to gain new members, they said. In addition, raiding activities have slackened off and the rival union has removed its campaign offices from the vicinity. Still pending, however, is a ruling on whether a new election will be necessary.

Usery's decision asserts the primacy of the Executive Order over any contradictory policies or practices of the Defense Dept., the Civil Service Commission or similar agencies. Also it rejects NLRB decisions as "controlling" the conduct of federal employes — a decision which leaves the Labor Dept. free to develop its own body of law and precedent as to unfair labor practices.

His ruling clears the way for federal employes to solicit union membership on federal property during non-work time, and to distribute union information on non-work time in non-work areas of the federal establishment.

The metal trades report that the ban on such activities in Charleston had the effect of preventing union stewards from adequately policing the contract, since yard management interpreted any request to leave the work area on union business as a form of electioneering.

A federal study committee reported last year that the lack of a third-party process in resolving unfair labor practice charges was a serious deficiency under the then-existing federal labor-management program.

To rectify this void, the committee recommended that the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations be authorized to issue decisions in such disputes. The President agreed, and Usery, in interpreting his powers, rejected the shipyard's claim "that I am without authority to find a violation in the instant case" because its conduct was based on directives issued by the Civil Service Commission and the Dept. of Defense.

Citing two Supreme Court rulings in NLRB cases as providing the basic rules for employe solicitation and distribution, Usery said there is no evidence to establish that union activity at Charleston would have the effect of "creating a safety hazard or interfering with work production or the maintenance of discipline."

Shipyard rules, he said, do not justify limiting the rights of employes under the Executive Order "to assist a labor organization."

tion of the proposed national contract terms. The deadline for ratification votes was Nov. 20.

More than a third of the local unions had by a heavy margin voted to ratify the agreement as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Two small locals voted no.

The proposed GM settlement would give 375,000 workers in U.S. plants wage increases ranging from 49 to 61 cents an hour this year, plus two additional increases of 3 percent in the second and third years, plus cost-of-living raises based on increases in the Consumer Price Index.

The living-cost formula calls for a raise of 1 cent an hour for every rise of four-tenths of a point in the CPI, with no ceiling. The agreement also makes it possible, beginning Oct. 1, 1971, for GM workers with 30 years of service to retire at any age with a $500 monthly pension.

Still to be settled are contracts for 25,000 GM workers in Canadian plants.

House Vote Okays Public Service Jobs

local government application for funds over that of a state.

One section of the bill would allow public and private employers to apply for federal subsidies of job upgrading programs that help workers prepare for higher-paying jobs. The federal government would pay 90 percent of the cost of the upgrading training and employers would receive additional bonus payments based on the number of upgraded workers who obtain and hold better jobs.

Actual funds to carry out the programs would have to be appropriated in separate legislation. But the Senate bill sets a substantially higher ceiling on manpower appropriations — approximately $12 billion over three years as compared with $7.5 billion in the House version.

The legislation is part of a manpower reorganization package sought by the Administration, and Labor Dept. officials had first insisted on the right to shuffle money authorized for public service jobs into other programs.

But after the Senate rejected Administration amendments by one-sided margins and passed a mandatory public service bill by a 68-6 vote, Labor Dept. officials agreed to go along with a smaller version of the Senate bill. Key Democratic and Republican members of the House Labor Committee worked out a bipartisan bill during an all-night negotiating session and the full committee gave its approval.

That was the measure sent to the House floor, and conservative attempts to kill the public service jobs section were soundly defeated.

A last-ditch attempt to send the bill back to committee was beaten on a 275-80 rollcall.

Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) chief sponsor of the public service jobs bill, described it to the House as a "program to provide decent employment for people who can't find it."

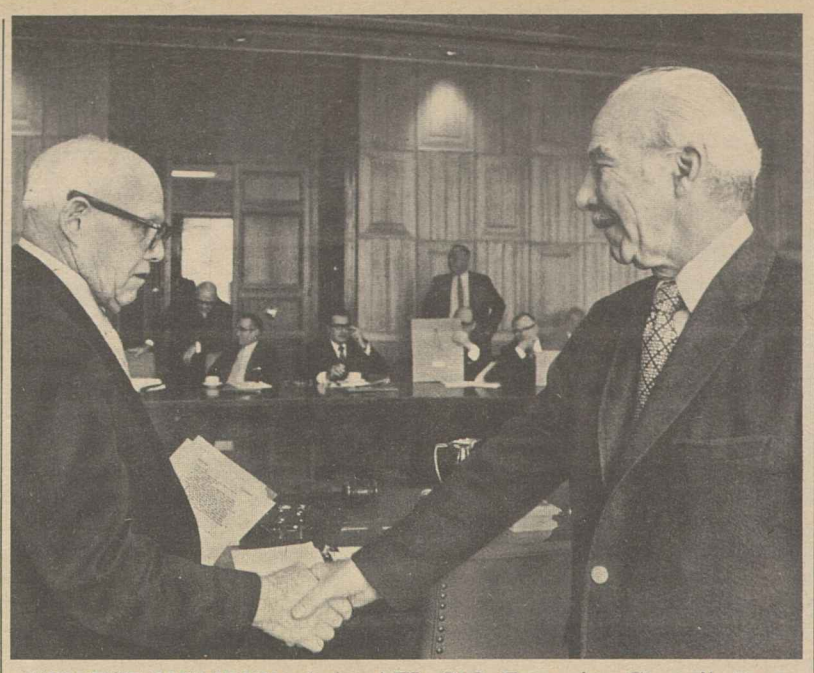
The effort to kill the public service section was led by Rep. William J. Scherle (R-Ia.), who charged that the Administration had made a bad bargain by agreeing to support the bill.

Final passage of the manpower bill was one of the top priority items on the legislative agenda proposed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council for the post-election session of Congress.



"With nationwide unemployment reaching critical proportions," the council said, the legislation should be passed "without further delay." It described the House and Senate bills as "aimed at creating badly needed public service jobs and vastly improving the host of manpower training programs."

In other congressional developments:

● The so-called equal-rights-for-women constitutional amendment, passed by the House, appeared dead for this Congress. Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), its chief Senate sponsor, sought to get agreement from women's groups supporting the amendment on a compromise he has introduced. This would add the phrase "on account of sex" to the 14th Amendment guarantees of rights. But the groups supporting the original proposal reportedly turned him down. Other women's groups, including trade union organizations, have opposed any constitutional amendment that would strike down state laws designed to protect the working conditions and health of women workers.

● The Senate Finance Committee, continuing its work on a House-passed social security bill, voted 8-3 to allow states to cut back on Medicaid services to poor families. It proposed repeal of existing legislation requiring states to maintain present services in order to be eligible for continued federal funds. The committee action is certain to be challenged when the bill reaches the Senate floor.

● Hearings on the nomination of Sidney P. Marland, Jr., for U.S. Commissioner of Education opened before the Senate Labor Committee. Marland told the committee he is "definitely opposed to strikes by teachers" but doesn't now oppose collective bargaining. The AFL-CIO has called for rejection of the Marland nomination and federation Pres. George Meany is scheduled to testify later in the hearings.

NEWEST MEMBER of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Pres. Alexander J. Rohan of the Printing Pressmen, right, is welcomed by Federation Pres. George Meany at the fall meeting of the council in Washington. Rohan was elected to the 35-member council in August to fill the vacancy created by the death of Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians.

Labor Presses Action On Electoral Reform

Labor strongly supports efforts to revive the propose constitutional amendment for direct popular election of the President, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a letter to Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.).

Bayh is the chief Senate sponsor of the amendment, which passed the House by substantially more than the required two-thirds majority last year. A filibuster kept the Senate from taking up the bill and it was set aside after attempts to muster a two-thirds vote to limit debate were unsuccessful.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the Senate to "act without delay" on the amendment, so that it can be submitted to the states for ratification before the 1972 presidential election.

Bayh had indicated his willingness to modify some of the provisions of the amendment—such as the proposed runoff if no candidate received 40 percent of the popular vote—in order to pick up added support in the Senate.

Meany wrote Bayh that "the AFL-CIO will support your efforts to work out an acceptable proposal that will attract the two-thirds approval necessary for passage of the amendment, while keeping secure the hope and promise of true electoral reform."

Noting the broad support the direct election amendment has received from labor, business and civic groups, Meany said it is clear that "the American people overwhelmingly support" the proposal.

"The forces of obstruction in the Senate won the first round and thwarted the democratic process," Meany said. "They must not be allowed to win the fight."

Meany stressed that the only alternatives that should be considered are those that do not damage "the heart of your amendment, which is that the candidates who receive the most votes will become the President and Vice President."

He said Congress should reject other proposals which, wearing "the mask of electoral reform." would perpetuate an electoral college system "that frustrates the will of the electorate."

'Patchwork' Trade Bill Passed Without Change

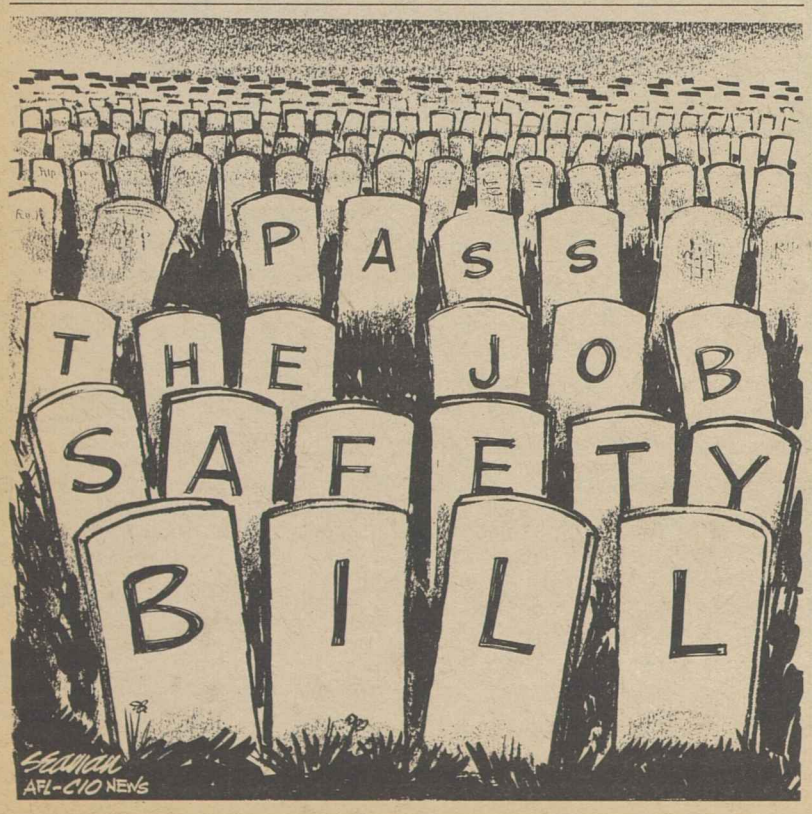
The President would, however, have authority to lift the quotas for a variety of reasons and any voluntary quota agreement negotiated with a country—such as in the current textile negotiations with Japan —would supersede the legislation.



The bill would also make it easier for industries and workers hurt by rising imports to obtain tariff relief and adjustment benefits. It would also renew the President's authority to negotiate tariff cuts with other nations in return for trade concessions on their part.

The House bill—but not the Senate committee version — includes a tax deferral provision intended as an incentive for U.S. firms to step up exports. This, the AFL-CIO Executive Council branded a "giveaway to large corporations." The tax loss to the U.S. government could add up to substantially more than the value of increased imports.

Another "backward step" in the House bill, the AFL-CIO said, is repeal of the American Selling Price system of tariff valuation which could cost thousands of jobs in the chemical industry. The Senate committee bill has no such repeal provision.

The Administration as well as Congress has been sharply divided on trade legislation with the State Dept. generally opposing quota legislation and the Commerce Dept. supporting import limits.

With changes made by the Senate Finance Committee, the legislation "would represent, for the most part, a step forward," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said earlier this month. But it described the proposals as "stop-gap" in that they don't go into the important areas of regulating "the substantial outflows of American capital for the investments of U.S. companies in foreign operations." Nor do they end the many tax subsidies which encourage U.S. firms to set up foreign subsidiaries—often resulting in phasing out manufacturing plants in the United States.

Congress Sets New Test On TV Spending

cluded media advisers to the Democratic National Committee and the Nixon campaign organization.

Pres. Nixon complained that the bill did not cover other forms of campaign spending and therefore was discriminatroy.

The political consultants agreed that broadcast spending is "only a part of the overall problem" but stressed that the vetoed bill "is an important first step toward reducing costs of campaigns and assuring an electoral system which guarantees that candidates will have equal access to the airwaves."

On a partisan level, Republican strategists had urged Pres. Nixon to veto the bill for a strictly pragmatic reason. The Republican Party and Republican candidates have been able to outspend the Democrats in nearly every election—and television time is the most expensive campaign ingredient.

To set a ceiling on broadcast spending would be a large step towards nullifying the advantage of being able to outspend the opposition.

GOP leaders were not unanimous on the issue, however. While Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott was trying to get GOP senators who voted for the bill to switch and sustain the veto, House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford said he would vote to override the veto. His statement marked a rare break with the Administration.

A substantial number of Republicans in both the House and Senate voted for the bill when it was passed. But at the time, there was no suggestion that the President might veto it.

Labor Dept. officials to seek a court order before directing the immediate shutdown of a plant where there is imminent danger of death or serious physical harm.

It retained the provision of the original bill allowing top Labor Dept. officials to order a plant shutdown immediately and allowing 72 hours after the shutdown to get a court order sustaining the action.

The amendment by Senators William Saxbe (D-Ohio) and Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) to require the court order in advance of a shutdown was beaten 42-40.

On the final passage vote, only three senators were recorded against the amended bill—Sam J. Erwin, Jr. (D-N.C.), James Eastland (D-Miss.) and Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

The close vote on the bill brought about the installation of Adlai E. Stevenson III as the new senator from Illinois a day before scheduled.

Stevenson had been elected to fill the unexpired term of the late Everett M. Dirksen—replacing Republican Ralph T. Smith who had been appointed to the post but was beaten in the Nov. 3 election. Thus he was eligible to displace Smith for the balance of this Congress.

Stevenson had not planned to take his seat until the third day of the session. But after the first close vote on the Administration substitute—in which Smith voted for the Dominick bill—Stevenson agreed to the request of Democratic leaders to claim the seat immediately.

He was promptly sworn in—and voted with the liberal Democrats against all weakening amendments.

House Adopts Weak Bill on Job Safety

By David L. Perlman

The House bowed to employer and Administration pressure and scrapped a labor-supported occupational safety and health bill.

A coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats substituted in its place a cumbersome, three-headed program that the AFL-CIO had termed "an administrative monstrosity."

The next step will be up to a House-Senate conference committee that will try to reconcile the House measure with a Senate bill that is one step closer to the original legislation. If the conferees can reach agreement, the final version will then be put to a vote in the House and Senate.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said it is "imperative" that the conferees strengthen the House bill, which he termed "substantially worse than the Senate measure."

He charged that the House version "makes a mockery" of the need to protect the health and safety of American workers.

Both the House and Senate Labor Committees had initially approved companion bills assigning to the Secretary of Labor clearcut responsibility for setting safety and health standards, inspecting workplaces, and ordering employers to correct violations.

Under the substitute bill passed by the House, only the inspection assignment would be left to the Labor Dept.

A five-member commission, appointed by the President, would have the job of setting standards after hearings.

A separate three-member panel would be named by the President to handle enforcement of the standards.

By contrast, the Senate-passed bill would assign standard-setting as well as inspection to the Secretary of Labor, using an outside panel only for enforcement.

Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), chief sponsor of the bill, sought to prevent the gutting of the legislation by offering a series of amendments aimed at meeting some of the charges that the bill could be used to "harass" employers.

But opponents could count, and they knew they had the votes to put over the entire substitute bill, which was co-sponsored by Rep. William A. Steiger (R-Wis.) and Rep. Robert L. F. Sikes (D-Fla.).

The Steiger-Sikes proposal was endorsed in a letter from Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson as an acceptable "compromise" between the original Administration proposal and the Daniels bill. Hodgson

Meany Rips White House 'Game Plan'

By John R. Oravec

The sharpest rise in living costs since April cut deeper into take-home pay of workers during October as the Consumer Price Index jumped six-tenths of 1 percent.

To AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the surge in October prices was "sad but not unexpected news."

"It proves what we've been saying for months—the Administration's game plan is an abysmal failure and the workers who still have jobs, the consumers and the jobless are paying a high price for that failure," he stressed.

Meany said that "it is high time the Administration stopped trying to kid the American public into thinking bad news is good news and get on with the job of setting America's economic house in order."

After seasonal adjustments, the October increase was five-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in September.

Despite repeated claims by the Nixon Administration that inflation is being controlled, prices over the past three months rose at an annual rate of 5.3 percent, the Labor Dept. reported.

Since October 1969, the CPI has advanced 5.9 percent. But the six-tenths of 1 percent surge in prices

Postal Pay Schedule Slashed to 8 Years

Unions representing more than 660,000 postal workers have negotiated a new pay schedule that will cut 13 years off the time it takes an employe to move from the starting salary to the top rate for his job.

The seven unions with exclusive bargaining rights for the nation's postal workers also won a provision that gives the big majority of workers—those with at least one year of service—an immediate pay raise.

They will be jumped one step on the pay ladder—worth $235 a year to the largest group of clerks and letter carriers. And instead of having to wait from one to three years for the next step in the pay scale, they will move up again in either 44, 34, 26 or 24 weeks depending on length of service. The most senior employes will advance to the top rate at the fastest pace.

For employes already at the top of their pay grade—those with at least 21 years of service—there will be a special, red-circled "equity increase," the equivalent of an additional pay step.

And for new employes and those with less than one year of service, the new union contract means that they will reach the top pay for their job in only eight years—instead of 21 years.

The agreement was the first test of collective bargaining since Congress approved the reorganization of the Post Office Dept. into a semi-autonomous U.S. Postal Service and set up machinery for direct negotiations on pay and working conditions between postal unions and management.

The principle of compression of pay scales had been agreed to in the negotiations that followed the wave of spontaneous strikes of last spring—when the AFL-CIO and the postal unions worked out a package pay, collective bargaining and reorganization plan for submission to Congress. But the details of how

Bid to Override TV Bill Veto Fails Narrowly

The Senate failed to override a presidential veto and Congress will be forced to start from scratch next year to write a law regulating the cost of political campaigns.

A solid 58-34 majority of the Senate voted in favor of overriding Pres. Nixon's veto of a bill that would have limited the amount of money candidates could spend for television or radio time. But that was four votes short of the two-thirds required by the Constitution. (Rollcall, Page 7.)

The AFL-CIO had urged Congress to override the veto, which it termed "politically motivated."

In a successful effort to win back some of the Republicans who voted for the original bill and to break the nearly-solid Democratic ranks, Pres. Nixon sent a letter promising cooperation in efforts to write a "comprehensive campaign reform bill in the 92nd Congress." There will be plenty of time, he suggested,

Marland Scored on Anti-Unionism, Cozy Ties to Corporate Interests

The AFL-CIO intensified its campaign against confirmation of Sidney P. Marland as U.S. Commissioner of Education with the release of a 14,000-word report spelling out labor's case against the nomination.

The report charges that since Marland's announced goal "is to close the circle between education, industry and government," his confirmation would close that circle by shifting control of the public schools from public boards of education to "corporate executive suites."

It questions Marland's ability to act impartially as Commissioner of Education because of his relationships with private businesses developed during his two and a half years as president of the Institute for Educational Development.

The report also accuses Marland of active hostility to the rights of teachers to engage in collective bargaining.

Copies of the report were sent to all members of the Senate Education & Labor Committee, which is now holding hearings on Pres. Nixon's nomination of Marland. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is scheduled to testify before the committee Dec. 1.

Marland himself appeared before the committee during the first two days of hearings and offered a seven-page statement "to clarify the record" on several points raised by the AFL-CIO.

He said he is not opposed to collective bargaining for teachers and recognizes that "teachers must have the right to withhold their services as a last resort when they the compression was to be accomplished were left to collective bargaining.

Both sides bargained down to the wire on the pay compression agreement. The negotiators had earlier agreed to ground rules that if no agreement had been reached by Nov. 20, the dispute would have been submitted to arbitration. But the two parties were able to resolve their differences on the eve of the deadline.

In preparation for these negotiations—and for the comprehensive full contract negotiations scheduled for mid-January—the seven unions had joined in a new Council of American Postal Employes (CAPE). They picked as their chief spokesman in the pay compression talks James J. LaPenta, Jr., of the Laborers, a former postal official.

Participating unions, all of which hold national exclusive recognition for their crafts, are the Letter Carriers, Postal Clerks, Rural Letter Carriers, Post Office & General Service Maintenance Employes, Mail Handlers division of the Laborers, Special Delivery Messengers, and Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes. All except the Rural Letter Carriers are AFL-CIO affiliates.

Postal supervisory employes, not represented in the negotiations, remain for the time being on the 21-year salary ladder. However, postal officials indicated that a similar salary compression for those not in the bargaining unit will be proposed to the governing board of the new postal service when the reorganization takes effect in January.

The pay compression agreement was the first change in salary schedules in the postal service that did not require congressional action.

The full-scale contract negotiations to begin in mid-January also will result in an agreement that will take effect without congressional action. The law provides for binding arbitration in place of the right to strike if agreement isn't reached in direct negotiations.

Under the new pay compression formula, the 12-step pay ladder will be retained. But instead of waiting one year between each of the earlier pay steps and three years for later advancements, the automatic progression will be as follows: 52 weeks from the starting rate to Step 2; 44 weeks for each advancement until the seventh step; 34 weeks for each of the next two steps; 26 weeks to Steps 10 and 11, and 24 weeks to the final step.

Gift to CARE Aids Pakistan Disaster Relief

The AFL-CIO has transmitted a cash gift to CARE to aid relief efforts for victims of the Pakistan tidal wave where it is estimated that as many as 300,000 may have perished.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, representing Pres. George Meany, told CARE officials he hoped the $2,500 he was turning over to CARE would spark a national drive that would result in generous contributions for the survivors of the worst single disaster in the 20th Century.

Minton, a CARE vice president, noted that CARE was the first agency to deliver aid to the disaster area. From its stockpiles in Turkey, the agency airlifted 15 tons of milk powder; from Karachi, West Pakistan's capital, it rushed 12 tons of vegetable oil; from India, 1,500 blankets.

As soon as the extent of the tragedy became known the CARE office at Dacca, East Pakistan's capital, placed its seven vehicles and chauffeurs at the disposal of the government for transport of help to the stricken areas.

In the course of the week, five tons of fortified food were airlifted from New York with Pan American Airways providing free space on its cargo planes to London, where Pakistan Airlines picked it up and delivered it to Dacca. On Friday, a shipment of 90,000 pounds of CARE food was flown direct to Dacca aboard a chartered plane from New York.

Frank L. Goffio, executive director of CARE, praised the prompt action of the AFL-CIO in responding to the East Pakistan crisis and expressed the hope that others will realize the extent of the disaster and rapidly respond.

Union Leaders on Panel For Arbitration Study

New York—A high-level union-management committee will work with the American Arbitration Association in a study of the possibility of increased use of voluntary arbitration as a means of avoiding strikes.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last August agreed to cooperate with the AAA study and Federation Pres. George Meany designated five council members to serve on the panel.

The labor members, all presidents of their unions and AFL-CIO vice presidents, are: I. W. Abel, Steelworkers; Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Charles Luna, United Transportation Union; John H. Lyons, Iron Workers, and Floyd E. Smith, Machinists.

Their management counterparts are Clark Frame, Westinghouse labor relations director; Algie E. Hendrix, General Dynamics vice president for industrial relations; Robert L. Higgins, executive vice president of the National Electrical Contractors Association; John P. Hiltz, Jr., chairman of the National Railway Labor Conference, and R. Heath Larry, vice chairman of U.S. Steel.

Representing the American Arbitration Association will be its president, Donald B. Straus; David L. Cole, one of the nation's best-known arbitrators, and David A. Morse, former director-general of the International Labor Organization.

Straus said the committee "will advise the AAA in two broad areas of arbitration: the improvement of procedures for the settlement of disputes under existing contracts, and the voluntary use of arbitration by labor and management when direct collective bargaining fails and there is a desire to minimize or resolve a dispute in order to avoid a long and costly strike."

At the time the Executive Council considered the arbitration association's proposed study, Meany told newsmen that the AFL-CIO agrees "that it is a good thing to study."

Meany stressed that labor must continue to have "the right to strike." But without making any advance commitment as to the outcome of the study, "if some better method can be found, voluntarily, I think it might be well."

Foreign-Held Firm Hit By NLRB on Violations

Georgetown, S.C.—Management of the German-owned Georgetown Steel Corp. plant followed the standard anti-union practices of American businessmen in firing union adherents and threatening to close the plant, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner reported.

Examiner Frederick U. Reel ruled after hearings that managers of the new $30 million steel plant here illegally fired three employes who showed interest in the Steelworkers early this year. He found that they also:

- Questioned other workers about whether they had signed union cards, attended union meetings or engaged in any union activities.
- Told employes they could not keep their jobs if they filed charges with the Labor Board.
- Ordered employes not to display union signs or buttons, and otherwise took steps to stamp out an organizing drive.

Reel recommended that the NLRB order the corporation to stop its unfair and unlawful practices; post notices of its willingness to obey the law, and offer "immediate and full reinstatement" of the three fired workers to their former jobs, with back pay and full regard for their seniority and other rights.

The USWA started an organizing drive in February. It won a representation election by an overwhelming 376-89 vote. But the German owners, Korf Industries and Hendel GMBH & Co., refused to take seriously its employes' rights under American law.

The examiner reported that the leading union supporter, Phillip Pope, was fired by management for talking to men described as "two residents of Germany, who were in the plant . . . apparently to instruct some of the employes in certain operations."

Reel related that the visitors "engaged Pope in conversation, expressing skepticism over the value of the union and its chances for success. . . . Pope replied to their comments," predicting that the union would win and be of benefit to employes.

Two nights later, Pope was fired an hour before the end of his shift, allegedly for violation of a no-solicitation rule. The examiner ruled that the company was searching for an excuse to fire Pope and did so, though it took no action against an anti-union employe who also talked to the visitors.

Union negotiators got nowhere in drawn-out contract talks. Some 500 workers have been on strike at the plant since Aug. 15.

After a rally of strikers Nov. 7, more than a dozen were clubbed and beaten by town police and some required hospital care.

President Visits Retail Clerks Union

Pres. Nixon used his rain check, visited the new headquarters building of the Retail Clerks and met with the union's executive board.

The President had been unable to attend the building's dedication last May, but the union kept the invitation open. RCIA Pres. James T. Housewright escorted Nixon and Labor Sec. James Hodgson on a tour of the building, followed by a 45-minute meeting with the board members.

The President left with an honorary membership card given in recognition of his efforts "to build a strong, free nation in a world at peace."

IUE Ratifies Pact At Five GM Plants

Detroit—Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in five General Motors Corp. plants approved the terms of a new three-year agreement and began returning to work in Dayton and Warren, O., Rochester, N.Y., and New Brunswick, N.J.

IUE Conference Board Chairman Homer Pierce called the settlement "the richest ever won" by IUE for its 30,000 members at General Motors. It parallels the agreement reached earlier by the Auto Workers but contains one additional provision — payment by GM of $30 a week to some 12,000 Ohio members who did not receive supplemental unemployment benefits while on layoff.

GM had refused to pay SUB to Ohioans who also had been denied unemployment insurance because of an Ohio law prohibiting payments to any worker laid off because of a strike in the same company, even if called by a union other than his own.

Pierce said the union will ask Gov.-elect John Gilligan (D) to keep a campaign pledge to seek repeal of "this unfair section" of the law.

Meanwhile the UAW announced that its new national agreement with GM went into effect Nov. 23 for all plants where local supplemental pacts also have been agreed to. A majority of members in most of the locals voted to ratify the three-year agreement. It provides wage increases of 49 to 61 cents an hour this year, plus two additional increases of 3 percent in the second and third years; living-cost increases and other benefits.

The strike that started Sept. 15 will be declared ended when local pacts have been concluded. The union represents 375,000 workers in U.S. plants and another 25,000 in Canada, who bargain separately. Still unsettled are agreements with Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp., which are expected to follow the GM pattern.

While the UAW strike was on, IUE members suffered heavy layoffs in electrical component plants —Packard Electric in Warren, Frigidaire and Delco Products in Dayton, Delco Appliance in Rochester and Delco-Remy in New Brunswick, N.J.

The IUE settlement calls for wage boosts of 49 to 55 cents an hour this year, plus a 3 percent general improvement factor increase, worth 11 to 19 cents an hour, in the second and third contract years.

Also agreed to is an unlimited cost-of-living allowance geared to rising prices; retirement at age 56 after 30 years of service with GM; and sizable increases in health, hospital and drug insurance benefits.

For the first time, IUE members will be protected by a guaranteed annual income plan. Laid-off workers will be paid 95 percent of take-home pay after taxes, minus work-related expenses for every week of full layoff. This represents a rise of $13 to $25 a week over previous SUB benefits, the union said.

Other gains include increased pensions and insurance for those already retired, new benefits for skilled trades workers, and settlement of thousands of local grievances.

Actors Press Program To Promote Film Jobs

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild installed Charlton Heston for a sixth term as president, gave its annual Guild award to veteran actor Gregory Peck, and launched a program to relieve the plight of members and their industry.

Heston told an audience of 1,100 at the union's annual meeting here that the Guild's program will seek:

- A widely expanded and more effective preference-of-employment clause in new screen contracts up for negotiation next spring. The clause should cover all classes of player employment and provide "far heavier" penalties than the present contract clause, he declared.
- Additional agreements with producers to make more films in Hollywood to reduce the loss of jobs to "runaway" production overseas. The "comeback" contract negotiated last year with the support of other studio unions brought 23 pictures to production in Los Angeles-area studios.
- Legislation to give preferential tax treatment to domestic filmmakers.

Heston also reported that the SAG board has instructed the Guild's counsel to file a lawsuit on behalf of a member to challenge the "tough approach" to unemployment insurance taken by the California State Human Resources Dept.

"We intend to use our full efforts to see that a fair break is given to actors in these trying times of industry-wide unemployment," he declared.

Film production around the world, Heston said, has fallen to its lowest ebb in memory. Whereas 80 million people "went to see our films" 10 to 15 years ago, the weekly figure has dropped to 15 million —made up largely of young people under 30.

One hope for the future lies in the production of video cassettes for showing on home television screens, he noted. The Guild, its president said, is "totally determined to establish the actors' prime right to an on-going share" in the continuing proceeds from the rental or sale of cassettes to home users, "by whatever system of hardware employed."

The Guild will be the first American actors' union to negotiate in this area when its theatrical contract runs out next spring, he noted.

Treas. Gilbert Perkins reported that the union operated at a deficit of $60,830 in the last fiscal year, compared with a surplus of $97,706 a year earlier. Either an increase in initiation fees or an increase in dues, or both, will result unless members pay current dues more promptly, he warned.

Peck, who has starred in more than 40 feature movies, was cited for outstanding achievement in "fostering the finest ideals of the acting profession." He was praised for his efforts on behalf of scores of good-citizenship activities. Peck received the Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian decoration, from Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson in 1968.

Arbiter Widens Incentive Pay At U.S. Steel

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers announced that an arbitrator has ruled in the union's favor in extending incentive pay coverage to more than 91 percent of the union's members employed by the U.S. Steel Corp.

Retroactive payment of the award will exceed $5 million, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said in announcing the ruling by Sylvester Garrett, chairman of the board of arbiters for the corporation and the union.

Garrett's decision came after the USWA had been forced to invoke arbitration twice in a long dispute with the giant steel firm. The ruling provides for retroactive payment of 10 cents an hour under terms of an original award by a three-member panel of arbitrators on Aug. 1, 1969.

James P. Griffin, chairman of the union's U.S. Steel Negotiating Committee and assistant to Abel, said the award will extend incentive earnings opportunities to 7,000 U.S. Steel employes, in addition to 3,000 who benefited from the previous arbitration ruling.

Incentive pay became an issue during negotiations for a three-year Basic Steel contract with major steel firms in 1968. It was submitted to final and binding arbitration by mutual agreement. Only one firm has not settled — Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., the union said.

Gerald Paley Named to Labor Dept. Legal Post

Gerald L. Paley has been appointed Associate Solicitor of Labor for labor relations and civil rights. He will be responsible for the Dept. of Labor's legal functions in these areas. Paley has been counsel for labor relations since he joined the department in April 1970.

5-Month Bakery Strike, Boycott Settled by Union

The Bakery & Confectionery Workers announced that a five-month strike and a consumer boycott against two Eastern Bakery firms have ended in improved contract terms and the reinstatement without reprisal of all strikers.

The final settlements, ratified by employes of the Stroehmann Brothers Bakery and the Schmidt Baking Co., represent a "complete victory" for the union, B&C Pres. Daniel E. Conway said.

Conway expressed appreciation to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, members of the federation's Executive Council and unions everywhere for coming to the aid of strikers in Baltimore and Cumberland, Md., and other cities.

After the strike started, the union conducted an organizing drive among Schmidt employes at a non-union plant in Martinsburg, W. Va. The vote was 62-22 in favor of the Bakery Workers, who expect to be certified as the winner by the National Labor Relations Board.

The Stroehmann firm, which operates seven plants in Pennsylvania, one in New York and one in Cumberland, agreed to dismiss all strikebreakers, to withdraw all decertification petitions, return all strikers and sympathizers to work with full seniority and other rights, and to increase economic benefits substantially over the best previous offer.

Schmidt agreed to recognize the union as bargaining agent at its Baltimore plant and to execute an agreement. The strike at the Cumberland plant was settled, Conway said, with substantial increases in wages and other benefits and full reinstatement of strikers and employes who respected their picket lines.

The dispute began when Stroehmann bought the Ort's Baking Co. plant in Cumberland, where B & C had enjoyed 30 years of amicable union-management relations. Employes walked out when the new management frustrated all efforts to reach an agreement. Workers at other Stroehmann plants were fired for honoring picket lines set up by the Cumberland strikers.

When the pickets were joined by Schmidt Baking employes in Cumberland, 90 percent of the company's Baltimore employes also walked out, seeking recognition of their union. The union actions involved a total of about 350 workers.

B & C launched a consumer boycott against the two firms Oct. 8, and was supported by the Retail Clerks, Meat Cutters and Teamsters. Soon afterward the AFL-CIO Executive Council called on all affiliated unions to "give this struggle your full support."

5th Blue Cross Unit Picks Office Union

Milwaukee—The Office & Professional Employes won their fifth unit of Blue Cross employes in a National Labor Relations Board election here. The vote was 328 to 308.

The victory climaxed a six-month campaign by OPEIU, aided by the Milwaukee and Wisconsin AFL-CIO bodies. The union represents other Blue Cross units in Buffalo, Newark, San Juan and Montreal.

Armstrong Locals Win Coordinated Victories

Seven local unions with 8,000 members ended 25 years of fragmented bargaining by pooling their strength to win improved contracts from the Armstrong Cork Co., big tile and gasket manufacturing chain.

The new agreements provide wage increases of approximately 7 percent this year and 6 percent next year. Other gains include improved pensions, vacations, health and accident insurance, income protection, a new dental surgery plan, and additional holidays at four plants.

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said the settlement ended five strikes that began in June when the company locked out 1,150 members of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers in Macon, Ga.

Union members then walked out at company plants — the Rubber Workers in Beaver Falls, Pa., and Jackson, Miss.; the Textile Workers Union of America in Fulton, N.Y.; and the Firemen & Oilers and an AFL-CIO Federal Labor Union in Braintree, Mass.

Strikes were voted by URW local unions at Pittsburgh and Lancaster, Pa., but settlements were achieved before the walkouts began.

IUD Rep. Joseph Campagna, who coordinated the contract talks, said the first agreement was reached in Macon with the help of URW Pres. Peter Bommarito, and then applied at the other Armstrong Cork locations.

The unions consider the contracts, with nearly identical terms, an achievement of coordinated bargaining though management required Campagna to meet separately with local company representatives at each location.

All the participating unions have agreed to maintain coordination in preparation for the next bargaining round in 1972.

The first meeting of the union coordinating committee was called in May of 1969. The last strike ended Nov. 15, 1970, when both sides agreed there would be no loss in continuity of service for strikers at any location.

The final agreements call for a minimum pension of $5 a month times years of service; a contract reopener in 1972 on the pension plan; vacations of four weeks after 15 years of service, five weeks after 25 years; and increased benefits up to $100 a week for sickness and accident coverage.

Additional paid holidays were won for union members at Pittsburgh, Beaver Falls, Lancaster and Jackson.

A New Game Plan?

THE ADMINISTRATION'S celebrated "game plan" to cool off the economy while preventing undue unemployment was one of the major victims of the 1970 elections.

There is widespread agreement that the President's economic policies contributed to the surge of victories that prevented Republican control of the Senate and gave liberals and moderates a strong voice in the statehouses.

That means the Administration must come up with a new "game plan" for the 1972 presidential election, a new economic policy that will contain price increases and bring down unemployment.

From the initial flow of stories from "informed sources" and the general floating of ideas by Administration spokesmen, it seems that the new "game plan" may well be aimed at wage increases won in collective bargaining.

The traditional charges that wage increases are causing inflation have been relatively muted in the past year or so as unemployment keeps rising hand-in-hand with living costs.

But lately the attacks on wage increases have been stepped up and the Administration is reportedly set to amplify these attacks into some form of national policy that could be a throwback to wage-price guidelines.

THE HARD FACTS of recent contracts—including the recently ratified contract at General Motors—is that most of the wage increase is due to the Administration's failure to hold down the rise in living costs. Of the first-year wage increase in the GM contract, for example, 33 cents is a catch-up with past cost-of-living increases. In the second and third year of the contract wage increases are set at a 3 percent improvement factor plus whatever happens to living costs as determined by the escalator.

The use of the escalator clause in a contract to protect workers against rising prices is described as "harmless enough in a period of gradually rising prices" by the Wall Street Journal, which adds that "they have a more serious impact in an era of strong inflationary pressure." In other words, it's okay to write a contract to protect workers' wages against rising prices, but not when prices are rising too fast.

The critical views touched off by an unlimited cost-of-living escalator are sure to echo over other areas of new collective bargaining agreements—all to the point that workers trying to keep their heads above the flood of higher living costs are contributing to inflation.

The Administration's internal debate on economic policy—and the "leaked" new stories stemming from this debate—are clearly seeking to establish a climate for a hold-down on wages.

A few weeks back the AFL-CIO Executive Council saw this coming and warned that "workers must not be compelled to endure additional months of spreading economic distress while the Administration debates the degree and timing of policy changes geared to having the greatest political effect on the campaign of 1972."

'Law-and-Order' Smokescreen Penetrated by 1970 Elections

By John P. Roche

WELL, THE SMOKE has cleared from the battlefield, the dead have been decently interred, and the wounded are recovering rapidly. The New York Times has even gone so far as to admit that James L. Buckley is New York's junior Senator, though the Boston Globe has yet to discover that the Democratic nominee for Massachusetts state auditor, an amiable gentleman named Thaddeus Buczke, notably outpolled Sen. Edward Kennedy on Nov. 3. Vice Pres. Agnew is presumably off somewhere reading a dictionary. Louise Day Hicks and Bella Abzug are in training for the preliminary Women's Lib bout, and Shirley Chisholm is set to take on the winner.

Perhaps this period of calm, or at least exhaustion, is a good time to straighten out a few political categories that have been employed in a fairly reckless fashion. In a whole series of pre-election polls, for example, voters seemed to be saying they were "moving to the right," becoming "conservatives" rather than "liberals." In fact, this did not reflect a basic shift in the attitude of the electorate; it arose from the incredible trip to political Disneyland that most liberal spokesmen took in the 1967-70 period.

Let us be very specific. To be upset about drugs and addiction, particularly among the young, is not a "conservative" attitude. I have two friends who are reformed "mainliners" — who kicked heroin and went through the tortures of the damned in the withdrawal process. They have been to the other side of the moon, and while they are politically "liberal" they would like to see drug pushers staked out on anthills. They want society to protect 19 and 20-year-old experimenters from the suffering they endured. They do not believe a decent society should permit young people to be sentenced to death by the criminals of the drug traffic.

MORE BROADLY, is the citizen who is disturbed about crime an automatic Tory? I recall discussing the crime problem with Louis Martin, one of the ablest observers of the black community who gave Pres. Johnson the kind of advice all Presidents need — straight answers to hard questions.

"Listen to me, John," Louis said, "who needs police protection? Your liberal friends in Chevy Chase? Hell, no! My people are the ones that get mugged, robbed, and raped, who can't get insurance for their stores, who are crying for decent police who will realize that Negroes are prime victims, not automatic criminals."

Is this a "conservative" approach? If a Negro woman gets disturbed by crime because she knows that her chances of being raped are roughly three times as great as those of a white, is she "moving to the right?"

In any sensible political universe, the answer to this question—and to those raised earlier about the merchants of death by drugs—is clearly that there is nothing "right-wing" about such vital concerns. The problem arose in those terms largely because the liberals handed these issues to the conservatives on a platter. Confronted wtih a problem, liberals, particularly intellectuals, have a positive genius for asking the wrong question. Instead of asking "What shall we do?", they inquire, "Why did it happen?"

AS A HISTORIAN I have no objection to exploring the roots of a historical crisis, but a political leader is not writing a doctoral dissertation. When the Washington ghetto blew up in 1968, the reality was that a handful of punks and gangster ideologues were destroying the property of other Negroes.

It had all the political significance of the Brink's robberies.

Yet all over Washington white liberals were exploring the roots of repression, the horrors of the slave trade, and generally accepting the riot as just punishment for white sins. (Conveniently the rioters did not burn down Cleveland Park or Spring Valley so Negro property owners in Northeast Washington had the doubtful pleasure of atoning for white sins.)

In any event, the 1970 elections seem to have cleared the air. The liberals suddenly realized that their sociological lectures were simply turning off the electorate. With indecent but timely haste they left others to explain "why?" and got to the gut question, "What must we do?" This display of simple intelligence obviously impressed the voters and gave the Democratic Party a new lease on life.

One hopes it will stick to making history, and let historians worry about the "why?"

Bayard Rustin Says:

Real Progress Against Crime Can't Be Attained Cheaply

By Bayard Rustin

IT IS PERHAPS inevitable at a time when "law and order" has become a euphemism for anti-black attitudes, and when the President, Vice President and Attorney General of the United States and many lesser officials in state and local offices offer anti-crime proposals that are clearly designed to appeal to white fear and prejudice, that many blacks are reluctant to speak out vigorously in favor of more and better law enforcement. This reluctance would not exist if we could destroy several myths about crime.

The first myth, perpetrated by the racists and the demagogues, is that crime essentially consists of assaults by Negroes upon whites. According to a government study released in September, the overwhelming number of crimes against whites are committed by other whites.

The second myth is that an anti-crime program would necessarily be an anti-black program. Blacks, in fact, stand to benefit more than any other group in the society from an effective program to reduce crime. Blacks are the victims of a majority of the violent crimes in the United States, and they are also among the prime victims of organized crime. In 1968, for example, the revenues from gambling and narcotics in three slum areas in New York City —Bedford-Stuyvesant, Central Harlem, and South Bronx—was $343 million more than the state spent on welfare in those areas.

It is ironic but true that those most quick to panic about crime are the ones least likely to suffer from it, while those who suffer the most from crime have been reluctant to advocate that measures be taken against it.

This leads us to a third myth—that "law and order" is a conservative and racist proposal. Certainly conservatives and racists have made use of this slogan to further their own deplorable ends, but it should not therefore follow that liberals and blacks should be against the content of this slogan. Indeed, one of the tragedies of the last few years is that the progressive elements in society have permitted the reactionaries to define the issues. Rather than propose a program of affirmative action, they have simply reacted instinctively against whatever the reactionaries have said. Thus, if it is "conservative" to be against crime, it is "liberal" to be for it.

The real division between conservatives and liberals on this issue should not be over whether or not they oppose crime, but over the kind of program they propose to fight it with. A characteristically conservative proposal is one that would not cost very much money. Thus, Nixon has proposed an anti-crime bill for Washington, D.C., that would include provisions for preventive detention of suspects and "no-knock" power for police raids. This is "law and order" in its more obnoxious sense—cheap and repressive.

WHAT CANNOT BE ignored is that any progress against crime will cost literally billions of dollars over what we are now spending on law enforcement. There must, for example, be a massive construction program of new correctional facilities. Sixty-one of the larger prisons in the United States were built in the 19th Century, and prisons in general are horribly over-crowded. A Prisons Bureau study has proposed the construction of 166 new federal correctional institutions at a cost of $700 million. (Incidentally, to my knowledge Nixon has not said anything about this study.)

It is also essential, as Chief Justice Warren Burger noted in his State of the Judiciary message, to overhaul our entire judicial system to insure that there is a 60-day limit between arrest and trial. Together, these reforms would do away with the terrible conditions that have led to a wave of prison riots.

There is also the need for more and better-trained personnel so that the prisons will encourage genuine rehabilitation and not, as they do now, breed criminals more hardened in their ways than when they were arrested. The police must also be reinforced, upgraded, and reformed. Police corruption must be rooted out and officers who violate the rights of citizens must be firmly disciplined.

Finally, fundamental to any anti-crime program must be full employment. If the unemployment rate among black youth is 34.9 percent, it is hardly surprising that the crime rate for these young people is also high. Other programs in the fields of housing and education will also be required.

To the extent that reactionary and simplistic slogans about "law and order" do not help bring about programs for penal and social reform, they will do nothing to stop crime. On the contrary, by debasing the meaning of law and order, they will make lawlessness and disorder even more common and more dangerous.

Wage Safeguards Essential To Welfare Reform Program

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION first "oversold" its welfare reform plan and then failed to push it effectively in Congress, an AFL-CIO legislative representative charged.

While the family assistance program does move in the right direction, "it has been billed as more than it is," especially in the area of putting welfare recipients into jobs, declared Clinton Fair. As a result, "many people think it will . . . put all the people on welfare to work, but it will not do that," he added.

The real "innovation in the new program," he said, is that for the first time, families headed by a working father could qualify for help, if their income falls below minimum levels. Fair appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Fair stressed the need for minimum wage or prevailing wage protection for welfare recipients who would be required to take jobs under the program. He said that without proper safeguards, the program could "create a pool of low-cost labor that would be forced to take any job, at any rate, and crack the whole wage structure in an area."

"It's kind of an indentured servitude, really," he observed, and the AFL-CIO will insist that both minimum wage protections and job-suitability provisions be included in the measure.

Turning to the job-training aspects of the family assistance program, Fair pointed out that prospects in that area hinge on the overall economic situation in the country. "The higher the employment rate, the better chance for success" of the training and work programs under welfare, he asserted.

"If the purpose of training is to make the department which administers the training look good," little can be expected to come from it, he said. Emphasis, he continued, should be put on service-type jobs, such as those in parks and hospitals, where there are opportunities, and on "upgrading workers through in-training programs, which is just as important as training for a beginning job."

Fair was questioned by Spencer Rich of the Washington Post and James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE ARE, perhaps, more misconceptions about welfare and public assistance than almost any other domestic issue in the country.

Recently the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare's Social & Rehabilitation Service issued reports that provide some factual data in this field.

John D. Twiname, administrator of the service, reported that in June 1970, 12.2 million Americans were receiving public assistance. Money payments to welfare recipients increased to $12.8 billion during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1970.

Twiname attributed the rise to unemployment, population increase, greater awareness of welfare benefits among potential recipients, and cost-of-living adjustments in payment standards.

Aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) and Medicaid accounted for more than 70 percent of the increase in last year's welfare costs.

HEW says that the number of persons receiving aid rose about 2 million over the year. About 85 percent of the rise took place in the AFDC program with 1.7 million people added for a total of 8.3 million. Three-fourths of the recipients in AFDC were children.

All states, whatever their political complexion, contributed to the annual increase, except Wisconsin. In 13 states the rolls went up by at least one-third and in three states—Oregon, Texas and Washington—the increase was more than 50 percent.

The combined AFDC total for California (1.3 million) and New York (1.1 million) represented nearly 30 percent of all AFDC recipients last June.

THE POPULAR BELIEF is that most welfare families and individuals are on relief year in and year out, having found a way of life that enables them to live adequately without working.

A new HEW report shows that this simply isn't true.

The typical welfare family is on the rolls for only a limited time, less than 24 months.

Researcher David Eppley of the Social & Rehabilitation Service recently analyzed three national studies in 1961, 1967, and 1969 of families receiving public assistance under the AFDC program.

He found that over the last 10 years the length of time the average family was on welfare shrunk from about 25 months in 1961 to 23 months in 1969. Also, nearly 60 percent of welfare families in 1969 were getting aid for the first time.

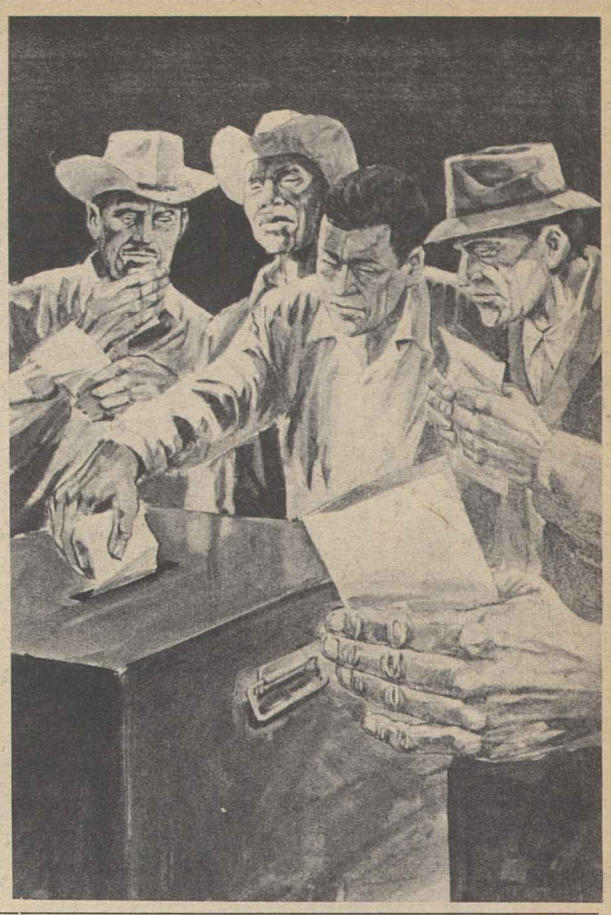
The Eppley study reports changes in the characteristics of AFDC families and households:

- Over the decade the percentage of AFDC families living in metropolitan areas, especially the inner city, rose from about 61 percent to 72 percent.
- The number of families with fathers absent increased from two-thirds in 1961 to three-fourths in 1969. Absence was due to divorce, separation, desertion or other causes and was a main reason for deprivation.
- By the close of the decade 50.5 percent of the welfare recipients were white, 47.5 percent were Negro and 2.1 percent from other races.

It is Eppley's view that these changes in AFDC families are "partly the result of changes in the general population of the U.S., for example, the shifting of the population from rural to urban places . . . and other federal programs helping fatherless children."



The figures also reflect, he feels, "changes in programs and policies such as the expansion of AFDC to include relatives living with dependent children and children 18 through 20 regularly attending school."

THE WELFARE REFORM PLAN proposed by the Administration has been oversold as doing more for the poor than it really can, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair, center, tells reporters on Labor News Conference. Fair was questioned by James F. Welsh, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Spencer Rich of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

THE STRUGGLE AND HARDSHIPS of the Farm Workers in their quest for union recognition and living-wage contracts are depicted in 12 full-color paintings that have now been converted into Christmas seals. A sheet of 48 seals is available through a $1 contribution to the UFWOC Defense Fund, P.O. Box 130 Delano, Calif., 93215. Three of the 12 paintings by artist Andrew Zermeno, himself a veteran farm worker, are titled, from left, Grape Strike—1970; Collective Bargaining on the Farm: Control of Dangerous Pesticides, and Secret Ballot Elections: Democracy in Agriculture.

World Drive Against Hijacking Urged by President-Elect of Pilots

Miami Beach—Full cooperation of all governments around the world, airport officials, airline companies and crew members is needed if air piracy is to be curbed, the president-elect of the Air Line Pilots declared.

John J. O'Donnell, elected at the 21st biennial ALPA convention, said that only through concerted effort by all parties involved in the airline operations will the problem of hijacking be solved.

He called for "workable iron-clad treaties with every government possible" to guarantee the return of hijackers and urged swift and severe prosecution.

O'Donnell will begin a four-year term next Jan. 1 to succeed Pres. Charles H. Ruby, who did not seek re-election.

Ruby, president of the union since 1964, told the 258 delegates that he advocates a boycott of airports which lack security against sabotage or air piracy. He said that a suggested 24-hour worldwide strike by pilots would do little to discourage hijackers.

Instead, he proposed sanctions against airports "in any country unwilling or unable to provide the necessary security" against violence.

In a message sent to the convention, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said that the federation fully supports the efforts of the ALPA "to stop piracy and banditry in the air."

"The U.S. government should spare no effort—diplomatic, political or economic—to reach an international accord which will bar flights to countries providing sanctuary for hijacked planes or hijackers," he added.

Meany also noted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council supports the concepts of the Tokyo convention of the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations that establishes air piracy as an offense against civil aviation.

The delegates—or ALPA board of directors, as the union refers to them—were expected to adopt a strict and comprehensive resolution on air hijacking later in the convention.

In another resolution, the ALPA condemned substandard air carrier airports that are allowed to exist throughout the nation. That resolution was prompted by the recent Southern Airways crash at Huntington, W.Va.

The ALPA's Gold Medal for Heroism was presented at the convention to Eastern Air Lines Capt. Robert M. Wilbur, Jr., and posthumously to James E. Hartley, Jr., for foiling a hijacking attempt last March.

Delegates also elected Alex C. Bonner as first vice president to succeed Robert L. Tully.

The combined office of secretary-treasurer was divided into two separate posts. J. P. Giberson was elected secretary and John R. Campbell treasurer. Richard H. Jones is the outgoing secretary-treasurer.

Elected vice president of the Steward & Stewardess Division was Kelly Rueck. She will take office immediately to succeed Margie Cooper. Magdalena Jacobson was elected secretary-treasurer of the division, succeeding B. J. Stewart.

Musicians, CWA Offer Holiday Calls for GIs

Thousands of American servicemen overseas will receive free telephone calls to their families as Christmas gifts from the American Federation of Musicians and the Communications Workers.

The AFM is expanding its two-year-old program this year to provide free calls on three days—Dec. 24, 25 and 26—rather than just on the 25th, as in previous years.

Servicemen in Viet Nam, Okinawa, Antarctica, Japan, Morocco and Europe will all participate in the program.

The calls are transmitted from overseas points through the Military Amateur Radio Service and connected with the telephone system by means of a "phone patch." Station equipment and telephone hook-ups are paid for by the AFM, and are monitored by Robert Altomonte, president of the union's Mansfield, O., local.

CWA's 14th annual "Hi-Mom" program was launched across the country last month. Early reports indicate that CWA locals will sponsor more than 5,000 calls between servicemen overseas and their families.

Funds are made available by the national union for more than 1,000 additional calls, largely to men in hospitals.

The United Services Organization (USO), the Defense Dept. and the Bell System will coordinate their efforts.

Meany Sets COPE Goal: Decisive Victory in 1972

"The 1972 election campaign has already begun," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message congratulating the COPE staff and volunteers on the sucess of this year's campaign.

It was "the most effective ever mounted by labor," Meany declared in a letter to COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

In the face of a "lavishly financed" opposition which resorted to "gutter politics of fear and smear," COPE volunteers "succeeded in making basic issues clear." The registration drives and Election Day effort brought millions of voters to the polls, Meany noted.

He asked Barkan to relay "warm congratulations" to all who worked in the campaign.

"But the time for celebration is over," Meany declared as he outlined the new assignment:

"Over the next two years, COPE will be working hard at the task of registering millions of additional voters, improving election laws, informing union members about the record of elected officials and preparing the way for an even more decisive victory in the next election."

Activities Schedule For Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center has six institutes scheduled for December and January. They are:

Leadership Training for Farm Workers at La Paz, Calif., Dec. 4-7.

Critical Problems in State Government, Dec. 7-10.

Board of Trustees Seminar on Mediating Community Disputes, Dec. 11.

Manpower Seminar, Dec. 9-11.

Staff Development Program, Jan. 10-29.

Collective Bargaining Seminar, Jan. 20-22.

150 Office Girls Win Walkout For Equal Pay

San Leandro, Calif.—Office girls in 22 supermarkets of the Lucky Stores chain staged an exhibition of union power that changed the image of their employer from Scrooge to Santa Claus, almost overnight.

Management made the sudden switch when confronted by 150 irate women members of the Office & Profesional Employes. Charging sex discrimination, the office unit walked off the job demanding equal pay and status with the company's male employes.

Sympathetic members of the Retail Clerks, Meat Cutters and Teamsters gave the girls their strong backing. One result was that Lucky Stores gave away $300,000 worth of meats, fresh fruits and vegetables, to prevent spoilage, to the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Salvation Army and other groups as a pre-Thanksgiving gift.

Another result was a new contract valued at about $2,000 per person over a three-year term. OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin listed these benefits:

Wage increases of 30 cents an hour this year, 25 cents more next Nov. 1 and a third 25-cent raise a year later; two more half-holidays for a total of 10; a cost-of-living wage boost based on changes in the Consumer Price Index starting next Sept. 1.

Management also agreed to raise its pension contributions from 15 cents an hour to 20 cents next year and 25 cents in 1972, to boost the night-shift differential wage from 25 cents an hour to 35 cents, to increase the maximum sick leave accumulation from 20 days to 3 years and life insurance from a top of $2,500 to $5,000.

Five Million Exempt From Tax Return

About 5 million low-income workers will not have to file federal tax returns next April because of new rules adopted by the Treasury Dept. to conform with the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The new regulations provide that a return will not have to be filed unless yearly income exceeds:

- $1,700 for a single person.
- $2,300 for a married couple or a single person over age 64.
- $2,900 for a married couple where one spouse is over 64.
- $3,500 where both husband and wife are over 64.

In the past, a person was required to file a return if his gross income was $600 or more, or $1,200 if he was age 65 or older.

The reform act that carries the tax relief for the low-income workers was passed overwhelmingly by both chambers of Congress with the firm support of organized labor. Pres. Nixon at one time indicated he would veto the measure, but later relented and signed the bill.

The relaxed filing requirements for married couples will apply only if both husband and wife occupy the same home at the close of the year, the Treasury Dept. said.

Temporary absences for special reasons will not affect the eligibility, but the higher exemptions will not apply if husband and wife file separate returns.

The Treasury Dept. said persons whose income will not exceed the higher tax-exempt levels, but who have had taxes withheld, should claim refunds by filing returns with the Internal Revenue Service at the end of the year.

The Tax Reform Act provides for further increases in personal tax exemptions and changes in filing requirements starting in 1973. The new regulations also cover these subsequent changes. By 1973 more than 7.5 million low-income workers will not have to pay federal income taxes or file returns.

Hodgson Names Aide For Legislative Affairs

Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson announced the appointment of Frederick L. Webber as special assistant for legislative affairs, the Labor Dept.'s top legislative post. Webber, a former congressional aide, succeeds William Gifford, who has joined the White House staff as special assistant to the President.

Veto Holds Up:

Senate Falls Short On TV Spending Bill

to enact legislation before the 1972 election campaign.

The President said the legislation should deal with all forms of political spending, not just broadcast costs, but did not spell out any details.

One Administration supporter did, however.

Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) praised the President's veto and said Congress should consider "many other facets" of campaigns.

"For instance," he suggested, "we should tighten down on the use of union funds in political campaigns."

On the showdown vote, six Democrats who had voted for the original bill last September switched to support the President's veto.

Nine Republicans voted with 49 Democrats in favor of overriding the veto, but five who had supported the bill in September voted against the motion to override.

Two Democrats and two Republicans who were present and who said they favored overriding the veto did not vote. They were announced as "paired" with two absent Republican senators who were opposed to overriding. Since the motion required a two-thirds majority, a "pair" required two senators in favor of overriding to match one senator opposed.

The vote on overriding came after the most expensive non-presidential election in history.

As in all recent campaigns, the most costly single item was television time. And as has been true in most recent elections, Republican candidates received the bulk of big campaign gifts.

Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.), author of the vetoed bill, reminded the Senate that when the legislation was being considered by Congress, the Administration did not voice any of the objections the President later gave as his reason for vetoing the bill. Nor did it propose a more far-reaching measure.

The vetoed bill would have allowed candidates or their authorized campaign groups to spend up to seven cents for each vote cast for the office in the previous election to purchase television or radio time—and half that amount on primary campaigns.

It also would have required stations to sell time for political broadcasts at their lowest commercial rates, which would stretch the buying power of the campaign dollar.

Another section of the bill would have permitted stations or networks to provide free time for political debates between major candidates by repealing a law requiring "equal time" for every minor party candidate.

Rollcall Vote on Attempt To Override Nixon Veto

A 58-34 majority of the Senate voted on Nov. 23 in favor of overriding Pres. Nixon's veto of the bill limiting political campaign spending on television and radio. But the attempt to override failed because it fell short of the required two-thirds vote.

Labor supported the position of the 49 Democrats and nine Republicans who voted to override the veto. Opposed were 28 Republicans and six Democrats.

Forecast by Michigan Economists Indicates Jobless Rate to Hit 6.1%

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Unemployment will continue to increase next year despite gains in the gross national product and a slowing in the rate of inflation, economists for the University of Michigan predict.

The economic forecasts by Professors Saul H. Hymans and Harold T. Shapiro indicate a national unemployment rate averaging 6.1 percent in 1971—a full percentage point more than the average for this year and 2.5 percentage points above the 1969 level.

In their report to the 18th annual University of Michigan Conference on the Economic Outlook, Hymans and Shapiro forecast a $68 billion increase in the GNP in 1971, a gain of about 7 percent from 1970 which is expected to show an increase of 4.75 percent over 1969.

They predicted that the 7 percent increase in the GNP would be composed of a rise in volume output amounting to a bit more than 3.25 percent, and a rate of price increase totaling nearly 3.66 percent—"a substantial decline from the 5.25 percent rate of inflation now expected for 1970 as a whole."

Hymans and Shapiro also foresee "a rebound in corporate profits amounting to an increase of nearly 6 percent over the 1970 level."

On wages, they forecast "virtually no change from the 1970 rate of increase of compensation per manhour," they said.

One of the principal reasons they give for the anticipated decline in the rate of inflation "is the substantial increase predicted for the growth of output per manhour in 1971."

The Michigan economists view unemployment as the major problem in the nation's economy throughout the next two years. They predict that the jobless rate will peak at 6.25 percent in mid-1971 and decline to 5.9 percent in the second quarter of 1972.

Despite the expected "substantial growth" in the GNP during 1971-72, the economists said that "full employment" is not anticipated before late 1973.

Hymans and Shapiro also foresee growth in fixed investment spurred by a turnaround in business capital spending after mid-1971 and continued increases in residential construction throughout all of 1971 and 1972.

Private housing starts of more than 1.8 million are forecast for next year and followed by an anticipated annual rate of 1.8 million for the first half of 1972.

Discussing the Nixon Administration's economic policies, the Michigan economists observed:

"It cannot be denied that the so-called 'game plan' has overshot its mark in terms of the prevailing unemployment rate. The rate of inflation has begun to fall, and if our forecast is close to the mark, we should be experiencing inflation rates of 2.75 percent a year from now.

"Based on all the evidence of which we are aware, such a rate of inflation is clearly below the level compatible with an unemployment rate of 3.75 to 4 percent.

"The policy dilemma which must now be faced is how best to support the economy's move to full employment without setting loose those forces which can lead to the truly excessive rates of inflation which characterized our most recent and too-short acquaintance with full employment."

Hymans and Shapiro suggest that the "rate of approach to full employment implied in our forecast is by no means too rapid."

"Any move toward more restrictive aggregative policies—regardless of projected budget deficits—should certainly be avoided," they recommend.

IATSE Elects Ryan Secretary-Treasurer

New York—Patrick H. Ryan has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Theatrical Stage Employes succeeding John A. Forde, who resigned for health reasons. The action was by unanimous vote of the IATSE executive board.

Ryan has been an IATSE vice president for 15 months. He started his career as an apprentice electrician and a member of Local 2 in Chicago. Later he joined Studio Mechanics Local 476 as a top gaffer. He served on the local's executive board and in 1963 was elected its business manager and secretary-treasurer.

Guild Warns Publishers On Exploiting Women

Chicago—Management exploitation of newspaperwomen through low-salaried jobs, unequal pay and discriminatory promotion policies "will no longer be tolerated," a Newspaper Guild conference on sex discrimination and women's rights declared.

A summary statement adopted at the conclusion of the three-day gathering charged that discrimination is "an inherent and all-pervasive reality" in the newspaper industry. It noted that women occupy fewer than two percent of management-level jobs while comprising 90 percent of "low-paid clerical help."

The conference drew 118 participants, mostly women, from Guild locals across the country. Four interest-group discussions on economics, professional interests, advancement and welfare, produced the following recommendations:

- Establishment of special recruitment, training and try-out programs to help upgrade women employes.
- Establishment of child-care centers for working parents in all Guild plants.
- Active campaigns by Guild locals to eliminate regulations that bar women from press boxes and press clubs.
- Elimination of separate "male" and "female" help-wanted ads and an end to labeling sections of the newspaper as "women's" or "society" sections.
- The advancement of women to international elective and appointive positions, as well as local leadership posts in the Guild.
- Expansion of maternity- and paternity-leave provisions in Guild contracts and the inclusion in health-insurance plans of coverage for vasectomies and abortions, where legal.

The conference expressed support of the so-called Equal Rights Amendment and protested the AFL-CIO's opposition to it.

Caroline Bird, author of the best-selling book, "Born Female," addressed the conference's opening dinner. She urged the Guild to concentrate on the establishment of child-care centers by newspapers and on special training programs and placement services for mothers returning to the work place.

ANG Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., who presided, said at a press conference after its conclusion that the conference represented "a beginning . . . and it is up to our members and our locals to see it through to achievement."

14,000-Word Report:

Anti-Unionism, Business Ties Cited in Case to Bar Marland

have exhausted all other remedies of the bargaining process without reaching agreement."

When questioned on this statement, Marland replied that he meant that teachers could not be forced to work, that they could always resign. He responded to a more specific question on the right of teachers to strike by saying, "I hold that teachers should not disobey the law."

Marland defended the role of the Institute for Educational Development as "assisting large corporations in making their expertise and resources available to schools" and "serving as moderator, monitor and evaluator of programs in which commercial enterprises may be engaged by school systems to provide materials or services."

The AFL-CIO's report on Marland includes these specific charges:

● Marland's opposition to teacher unionism is "a matter of principle with him" and a matter of public record. On Sept. 1, 1966, Marland, as superintendent of Pittsburgh schools, addressed the Pittsburgh teachers by television and declared:

"I do not intend to lead these schools by counting ballots, and I do not intend to be a party to the swift decline of teachers' freedom into collectivism in big cities. For labor, yes, for the skilled and unskilled, who need a collective voice, yes, but for teaching, of all professions, there has to be a better way."

Also, in a speech given in December 1966, Marland said:

"The essence of the labor movement in our schools is that the establishment of school policies and programs, declared by law to be the responsibility of the people through the board of education, is now to be negotiated. This is the largest threat to the American design for free schools that I know of."

● Marland has resorted to "distortions of fact" to prevent teachers from bargaining collectively.

As head of the Pittsburgh school system, Marland informed the unions that the state attorney general's office had advised the Dept. of Public Education that it would be illegal to recognize an exclusive bargaining agent. Marland maintained this assertion even after a letter from the attorney general's office denying that it had issued any official opinion.

The report further charges that "Marland distorted the facts in 1970 when he stated in an interview that his involvement in the question of collective bargaining for teachers was merely to explain to them the state law."

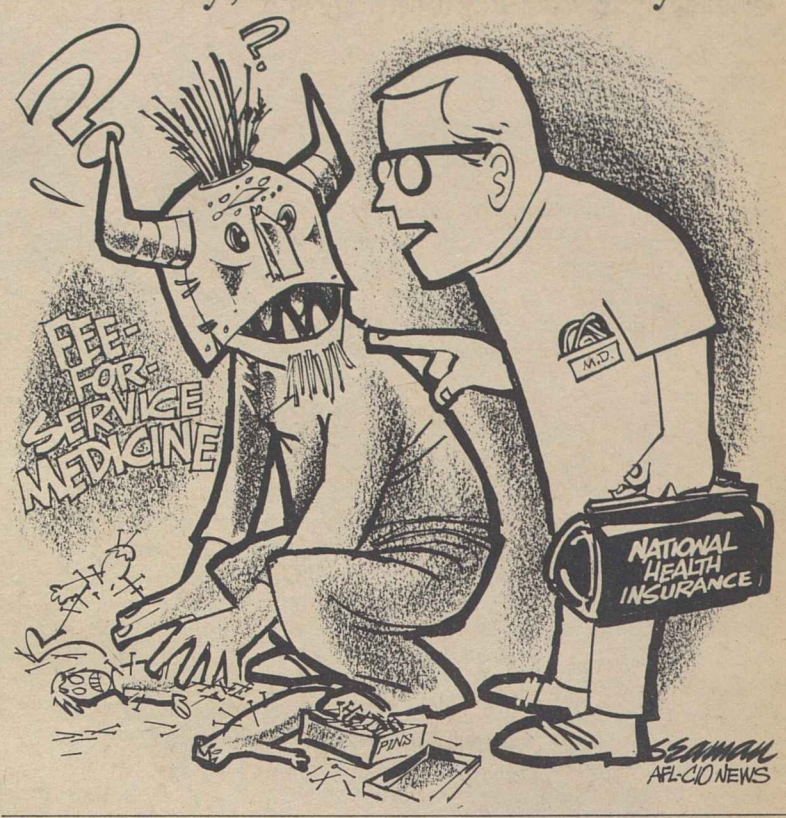
● The Institute for Educational Development received a contract from the State of New Jersey while the New Jersey state commissioner of education, Carl Marburger, was a member of the IED Board of Trustees. It was explained in the hearings that Marburger subsequently resigned, but Marland showed a lack of understanding of the problem of conflict of interest by saying that he did not think it was necessary for Marburger to resign.

● Other IED studies have interjected "businessmen's ideals" in place of the motives and ideals of public education. For example, in 1969 IED prepared a study, "Higher Education in Vermont: Its Resources and Needs," in which it suggested that one way to solve the financial problems of the University of Vermont would be to accept "fewer in-state students in preference for outside applicants" who would pay higher tuition rates.

● As president of IED, Marland has been associated with most of the firms in the education business. "Were he to become Commissioner of Education, Marland would be in the position of awarding millions of dollars in contracts to firms with which he was previously associated through IED."

● His confirmation would draw the Office of Education closely to a single element of the educational field—private enterprise—when it should be independent of any ties.

● Marland has proposed a "regressive system of testing" that will hamper minority youths seeking jobs. He recently submitted a paper to the College Entrance Examination Board's Commission on Tests explaining his plan as follows:



"Following the practice of the present College Board, the new organization would give a student a score or rating expressing the level of competence he has achieved in relation to the entry-level criteria for the field of work he wants to enter. His score or certificate of performance would become his credential wherever he applies for a job."

The AFL-CIO's report charges that "Marland's job-entry tests would simply become one additional hurdle for minority youths, guiding most of them, if at all, into low-level, low-paying jobs."

The federation's report concludes with this statement:

"The AFL-CIO believes that the Marland record is one of blurred relationships. It is difficult to distinguish where the progressive educator leaves off and the reactionary, anti-union administrator begins. It is hard to figure out where the concept of free public education stops and the corporate profit and loss charts pick up. It is a record in keeping with this Administration, which seeks to turn over to private enterprise increasing portions of the education pie."

'Really, There's a Better Way!'

House Passes Watered-Down Job Safety Bill

earlier had said he did not want authority to set and enforce on-the-job health and safety standards.

The Steiger bill was first tentatively approved by a nonrecord vote of 185-114. It was then formally adopted by a rollcall vote of 220-172.

With employer objections met, the bill was sent to conference by a 383-5 vote.

Behind the pressure for federal legislation lay the grim statistics of more than 14,000 on-the-job deaths and 2 million disabling injuries each year, along with the growing evidence of health hazards from chemicals and work materials commonly used in industry.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which successfully thwarted safety-health legislation during the Johnson Administration by wild charges to scare businessmen into bombarding congressmen with protests, switched tactics in the present Congress. Instead of fighting any law, it joined the effort to substitute a diluted bill surrounded by procedural obstacles.

Senate Expands Funds For Domestic Programs

quest and $168.5 million more than the House had voted.

Some of the added money may be pared in a House-Senate conference committee. But Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott warned his colleagues that the money they were adding was bringing the bill "mighty close to the veto range." Scott nevertheless voted for the biggest single addition to the committee bill—a $59 million boost in Head Start funds.

Last year, Pres. Nixon had vetoed the Labor-HEW appropriations bill as "inflationary."

The House, meanwhile, passed a compromise $17.7 billion substitute for the bill Pres. Nixon had vetoed carrying funds for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and 20 independent agencies.

The compromise measure is $300 million below the amount of the vetoed bill, but $241 million above the budget request.

It includes a $1.2 billion urban renewal appropriation, which is $200 million more than the budget figure but $150 million less than the vetoed bill. The other principal change is a $200 million funding of water and sewer grants, $50 million more than the budget but $200 million below the vetoed bill.

The revised bill was sent to the Senate by a 375-10 vote after only brief debate.

While Administration spokesmen were complaining that Congress was being too generous with domestic programs, Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird protested that Congress had cut his military budget too heavily.

He asked the Senate to restore $1 billion of the $1.9 billion cut by the House Appropriations Committee from the Defense Dept. budget request. Laird also asked an additional $354 million to cover expenses not contemplated in the budget proposals sent to Congress last January.

In other appropriations action, the Senate committee voted to approve the $290 million sought by the Administration and voted by the House to continue development of a supersonic transport plane.

A fight over the SST funding is expected when the bill reaches the Senate floor. But critical unemployments levels in Seattle, where Boeing Aircraft has laid off thousands of workers, add pressure for approval of the funds.

Sharp Jump in Consumer Prices Depletes Workers' Real Earnings

last month pushed the annual rate of increase to 7.2 percent.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics also noted that real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect the consumer price increases—dropped 64 cents a week to $77.04 for a worker with three dependents. This was $1.59 less than the average weekly take-home pay in October 1969.

The October increase in living costs pushed the price index to 137.4. This means a worker paid $13.74 in October for goods and services that cost him $10 in 1957-59.

Higher prices for consumer services, automobiles, clothing and gasoline accounted for most of the increase, the BLS reported.

Although food prices over the month rose about one-tenth of 1 percent, seasonally adjusted, the prices of other commodities increased about twiçe as much as they normally do in October.

Prices of new cars were up 5.4 percent from September and used car prices rose 2.3 percent. Gasoline and clothing for women and girls rose 1.3 percent.

Over the year, however, food prices were up 4.6 percent—and turkeys, as Thanksgiving Day approached, were 9 percent above the 1969 level, the BLS pointed out.

Housing costs, including rent and home ownership, rose five-tenths of 1 percent from September. Durable goods and appliances rose 1.3 percent over the month, the bureau noted.

Charges for medical care rose two-tenths of 1 percent, a little less than the month earlier, but were a full 7 percent higher than in October 1969.

Hit hardest by the decline in real spendable earnings were workers in the manufacturing sector. Here, the weekly take-home pay for a worker with three dependents averaged $84.43 in 1957-59 dollars, down $1.40 from September and $3.20 below the level of October 1969.

Overall, the purchasing power of workers in October averaged 2 percent below the year-ago month.

The bureau said that about 338,000 workers will receive cost-of-living wage increases based on the October CPI.

These include about 300,000 General Electric and Westinghouse employes who will get 5 cents an hour more under the first annual review of their new contracts.

Another 36,000 workers mostly in the metal industries will get hourly wage boosts from 3 to 8 cents, based on quarterly, semi-annual and annual reviews.

Joseph Gillis Dies at 84, Retired AFL-CIO Staffer

Baltimore—Joseph Gillis, whose labor activism spanned the period from the days of Samuel Gompers to the present, died here at 84. He had retired in 1958 after serving on the federation's regional staff since 1936.

Gillis, born in Philadelphia, joined the United Garment Workers when Gompers was president of the former AFL. He played an active role in city and state labor programs and served for many years as president of Clothing Cutters & Trimmers Local 15 of the UGWA and as president of the Baltimore Union Label Council.

White-Collar Salaries Rise 6.2% in Year

White-collar salaries rose an average of 6.2 percent between June 1969 and June 1970, according to a Labor Dept. survey.

The 12-month increase was the largest recorded in the 10 years the Bureau of Labor Statistics has collected salary data on a cross-section of clerical, professional, administrative and technical jobs.

The information is used to submit the government's recommendations to Congress for "comparability" pay adjustments for federal employes.

In most surveys, pay raises for clerical employes have trailed increases received by professionals. The 1969-70 tally, however, showed both groups averaging the same 6.2 percent.

In the 1968-69 year, the average clerical increase was 5.5 percent and professional pay raises averaged 5.8 percent.

Meany Assails Plan to Shift Inflation Burden to Wages

Opposition To Marland Spelled Out

By Jane Van Sant

Organized labor charged that Sidney P. Marland, Jr., lacks the "ethical sensitivity" and understanding of national needs necessary in a Commissioner of Education and urged that the Senate refuse to confirm him.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller presented the federation's statement before the Senate labor committee. Pres. David Selden of the American Federation of Teachers also testified against the Marland nomination.

The AFL-CIO statement asserted that "there is a crisis in education today" and that Marland "does not measure up to the needs of the times."

A major objection dealt with Marland's record as a "reactionary, anti-teacher union administrator." Biemiller cited Marland's record as a superintendent of schools in Pittsburgh and accused him of "distortions of fact" in his efforts to prevent the Pittsburgh teachers from gaining collective bargaining rights.

Biemiller also noted that when Marland met with AFL-CIO staff members, he characterized his past record of opposition to teacher unions as "knee-jerk reactions." This Biemiller suggested, raises the question of whether the committee could accept "Mr. Marland's 1970 excuses or his 1969 actions."

Confirmation of Marland, the AFL-CIO statement continued, could throw a "cold, wet blanket on collective bargaining relationships at the local level."

Dec. 10 Strike Date Looms for Railroads

By Eugene A. Kelly

Insistence of railroad managements that 425,000 union employes surrender hard-won working conditions in exchange for a wage increase was steering contract negotiations on a collision course.

The four unions involved in the long dispute reported that the carriers' position has brought wage talks almost to a stalemate. If it continues, they warned, a walkout seems certain at one minute after midnight Dec. 10, when the unions will be legally free to strike.

Negotiators for three of the unions said at a Washington news conference that they are willing to bargain "around the clock" to reach agreement. They added, however, that they cannot accept recommendations by a Presidential Emergency Board for a wage boost tied to changes in work rules established in previous bargaining over the years.

"We hope to settle without a strike," said Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union. But Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes cautioned "we will be free to strike Dec. 10 . . . and we will take such steps as we feel will settle this dispute." Vice Pres. Richard Smith of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes agreed, saying that work rules for dining car crews are so unjust that failure to improve them could trigger a walkout.

Similar reports came from Chicago, where a fourth union—the Railway & Airline Clerks—authorized strike preparations while negotiations creep along at Washington sessions called by the National Mediation Board and Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr.

"We are born optimists," said BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis after a day-long meeting of general chairmen. "We keep hoping the railroads

Senate Panel Votes Changes In Trade Bill

The Senate Finance Committee rewrote a House-passed trade bill and voted to tack it onto social security legislation in the hope of averting either a filibuster or a presidential veto.

The committee changed its mind about several provisions of the bill, finally voting to restore a quota on shoe imports that it had eliminated at a session when three members were absent.

But it held firm on rejection of a section of the House bill that labor had termed a giveaway to big corporations. This would have set up a tax deferral plan as an incentive for U.S. companies to increase ex-

Rejects Call To Sacrifice Pay Goals

By David L. Perlman

America's workers and their unions "won't buy" the Nixon Administration's demand that they make a one-sided sacrifice, at the bargaining table, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The latest "inflation alert" of the President's Council of Economic Advisers complains that wages are rising too rapidly. According to the Administration's game plan, unions should lower their pay goals "in response to the slack in the economy."

Meany sharply criticized the report as "heavily weighted against wage increases for workers" but "very solicitious about profits of business."

He stressed that "workers and wages did not cause this inflation," that the buying power of the average take-home pay is less than a year ago "and even below 1965."

And he served notice that organized workers will continue to bargain for "a fair share of the pie" to restore their equity in the American economy. (Excerpts, Page 4.)

The economic report, unveiled at a White House briefing, was the closest the Administration has come to "jawboning"—trying to influence wage and price decisions by public lecturing.

There was a token cautioning of employers "that we shall not make progress in reducing the inflation rates if the gains we hope to make on the labor cost front are offset by too-rapid increases of profit margins."

But the Administration econo-

Amendments Cut Back Housing Legislation

A stripped-down housing bill, containing some new labor-supported programs, won House approval after a bitter, two-day legislative battle.

The Nixon Administration had opposed any new legislation, and had asked Congress merely to vote a six-month extension to existing programs that otherwise would expire.

On a key 101-94 vote, the House rejected the Administration's "do-nothing" proposal.

But the House also hacked away at the comprehensive package bill sent to the floor by its Banking Committee.

Democratic floor leaders had sought to preserve the bulk of the legislative package by endorsing a bipartisan compromise. But the compromise bill was then gravely weakened by an amendment which killed its innovative new communities program.

The deleted section, similar to legislation already passed by the Senate, would have established a Community Development Corp. to provide both planning and financial assistance to public and private developers to build "economically balanced" new communities in metropolitan areas.

Still in the bill however are a number of other labor-supported innovations, including housing developments for farm workers

Census Reflects Shift In Political Strength

In political terms, the 1970 Census confirms the trend of the past three decades.

California and Florida remain the big growth states, continuing to gain congressional seats and electoral votes.

New York and Pennsylvania will wield somewhat less political influence in party conventions, presidental elections and House voting blocs.

The 93rd Congress, to be elected in 1972, will have more House members from suburban counties and fewer from big cities and rural districts.

Because of strong Democratic gains in this year's elections of state legislators and governors, there is not likely to be one-sided party changes as a result of redistricting. If the political switches in the states hadn't taken place, major Republican gains would have been almost certain.

The five-seat gain in California moves it firmly into the Number 1 spot with 43 House seats to 39 for New York, which for the third consecutive census lost two seats.

Since the 1950 Census, Califor-

Labor Board Caseload Hits New Record

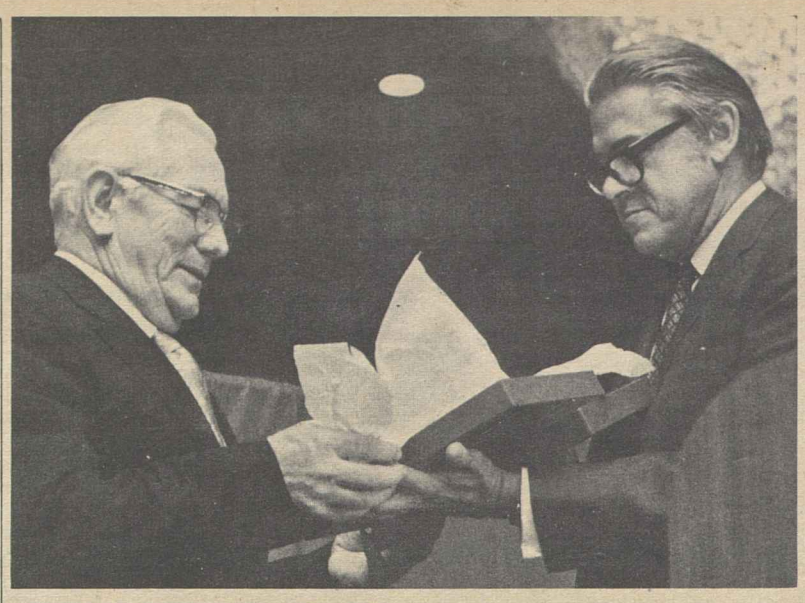
New cases continue to flood National Labor Relations Board offices across the country at a record-setting rate, the board reported.

For the three months of July through September 1970, total cases increased by 17 percent, unfair labor practice charges by 23 percent and election petitions by 7 percent over the same quarter of 1969.

NLRB offices received 9,498 cases of all types in the July-September quarter to set a new record for any three-month period since the NLRB opened for business in 1935. In the same quarter a year ago, 8,122 cases were filed by individuals, employers and unions.

The 6,119 charges of unfair practices also was a record for the quarter.



The NLRB received 3,739 petitions during the period for secret-ballot representation elections, union shop deauthorization polls, amendments to union certifications, and requests for the board to clarify employe bargaining units. The total rose by 214 over the year.

None of the new cases was initiated by the board or its offices.

The NLRB also reported that in the three-month period, the board's general counsel issued 636 formal complaints of unfair practices and set them for trial. A year ago the three-month figure was 541 complaints issued.

In litigation of complaint cases, trial examiners conducted 219 hearings during the quarter. The five board members issued formal decisions in 124 unfair practice cases, including jurisdictional dispute cases.

The NLRB said it conducted 1,871 representation elections in which 86 percent of eligible employes voted. Employes chose a union to represent them in 55 percent of these elections. AFL-CIO unions were chosen in 570 of 1,100 elections they participated in.

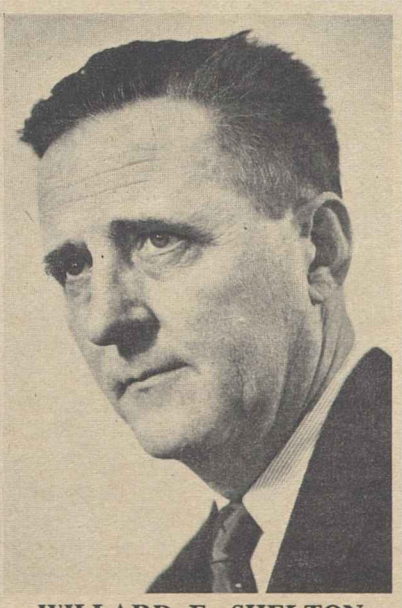
Willard E. Shelton Dies, Retired AFL-CIO Editor

Willard E. Shelton, former managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, died Dec. 1 at George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C., after an illness of several weeks. He was 65.

Shelton retired Feb. 1, 1968, after 10 years as managing editor of the News but continued to report on the political scene and congressional affairs as Washington columnist for the Guild Reporter, the Newspaper Guild publication, and several other union papers.

In a newspaper career that spanned 30 years in Washington, Chicago and St. Louis, Shelton established a national reputation as a liberal columnist and editor. He specialized in national political affairs and covered every party convention and presidential election in the post-World War II years until his retirement.

Born in St. Louis, he graduated from Eureka College in Illinois and did graduate work at Washington University, St. Louis. He was a high school teacher for two years before joining the staff of the Christian Evangelist in St. Louis in 1928. He was editor of the publication from 1935 to 1938.



He then went to the St. Louis Star-Times as an editorial writer and was editor of the paper's editorial page from 1939 to 1943, when he joined the staff of the Chicago Sun as an editorial writer.

Shelton came to Washington in 1946 as a member of the Washington bureau of PM and became bureau chief for its successor, the New York Star. He later was Washington editor of the Nation. For a time he was a free-lance writer, contributing frequently to liberal magazines and labor publications.

He was an active member of the Newspaper Guild in the three cities where he worked and was a candidate for ANG president in 1947. He began writing a column, "It's Your Washington," for the former CIO News in 1953 and continued in the AFL-CIO News after the 1955 merger. At that time was an assistant editor of the News and in 1958 became managing editor of the paper and assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications.

His wife, Isabelle Graham Shelton, is a reporter for the Washington Evening Star. Other survivors include three daughters, Gale Graham and Diane Isabelle of Washington and Mrs. John dePinto of Peoria, Ill.

Machinists Win Battle For Addresses of 25,000

New York—The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals here has ruled that United Aircraft Corp. of East Hartford, Conn., must give the Machinists the current addresses of all 25,000 employes represented by the union.

The employes live in 118 different central Connecticut towns and are represented by four different locals which make up IAM District 91. They work in six different United plants.

In handing down the ruling, the court upheld a National Labor Relations Board order. It also ruled that United was guilty of unfair labor practices in repeatedly refusing to give the union the addresses over the past 20 years.

IAM General Counsel Plato Papps said the decision firmly establishes the fact that a company must provide a union with up-to-date addresses of employes it represents when they are widely dispersed.

The address-list question was a key issue in a six-week 1960 strike and in subsequent litigation between the Machinists and the company.

A company contention that the address list would be used to harass employes who crossed picket lines in the 1960 strike was rejected by the appeals court. That was 10 years ago, the decision noted, and there has been "no evidence of harassment since."

The court also held that use of stewards, handbills, literature racks and bulletin boards were inadequate methods of informing all employees of union matters.

United Aircraft had offered to mail out union letters if its mailing equipment was not in use.

But, there was a catch to the offer. United had stipulated that it would mail material dealing only with "matters relating to contract negotiations," leaving itself as the sole judge of what could be mailed.

The court noted that United had mailed copies of the IAM's contract proposal in 1968, but that it had refused to send a union survey concerning employe interests in an automobile plan.

"The union's duties as exclusive bargaining representative do not end at 'matters relating to contract negotiations,'" the court said. "They also include other matters such as the insurance plan."

Union Housing Complex Wins HUD Design Prize

The labor-owned Acorn Housing complex in Oakland, Calif., has been designated for an honor award for project design by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

The Acorn development is owned by the Alameda County Building & Construction Trades Council. It consists of 479 family housing units that are blended into two- and three-story structures.

Political Trend Confirmed:

Suburbs Gaining House Members

nia has gained 20 House seats. And Florida—on the other end of the Sunshine Belt—has more than doubled its House delegation from 6 to 15 seats. Its latest gain was three seats.

Pennsylvania, meanwhile, will lose two more seats to bring its loss in the past three census reapportionments to eight.

But even if the electoral college system is not changed by constitutional amendment, 1972's presidential candidates will be spending most of their campaign time east of the Rockies.

Despite California's growth, the 13 Western states will yield only 102 electoral votes. Twelve Eastern and Mid-Atlantic states will cast 141 electoral votes; 12 Midwestern states will have 145 electoral votes, and 13 South and Border states will hold 147 electoral votes.

In terms of House seats, Democratic legislatures will write the redistricting laws in three of the four states with multi-seat changes. In California, the redistricting will be subject to veto by a Republican governor. But in both Florida and Pennsylvania, the governorships as well as both houses of the legislatures are held by Democrats. Only in New York is there a combination of a Republican legislature and a Republican governor.

In nearly every state, however, there will be opportunity for political gerrymandering as a result of population shifts within the state. The obligation—spelled out in a series of Supreme Court decisions—is congressional districts of equal population. But the courts have been loath to interfere with the politically hallowed tradition of carving out district boundaries for partisan advantage.

Thus, the judicious shifting of a Democratic township to an adjoining strongly Democratic district can transfer a marginal district into Republican territory—and vice versa.

Most of the nation's largest cities either lost population or barely held their own—and can expect to lose congressional seats. Among the five largest, only Los Angeles gained.

Apart from the multi-seat gains in California and Florida and the two-seat losses in New York and Pennsylvania, the Census report will bring the following one-seat changes:

Gaining a seat will be Arizona, Colorado and Texas.

Losing a seat will be Alabama, Iowa, North Dakota, Ohio, Tennessee, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

An extremely complex formula determines the apportionment of the 435 House seats since every state is entitled to at least one congressman. Sometimes the tipping point is very close. Thus, both North Dakota and South Dakota each lost close to 14,500 people since the 1970 Census. South Dakota, with 666,257 people, retains its two House seats. But North Dakota, with 617,761, loses one of its two seats.

New York had a population increase of more than 1.4 million people over the decade. But because the increase did not keep pace with the nation's growth—an 8.4 percent rise as compared with the national total of 13.3 percent—the state loses two of its 41 House seats.

Preliminary estimates had pointed to a one-seat gain for Connecticut and a one-seat loss for Oklahoma. But the final figures left each state with the same congressional representation as at present

Under the law, the President will formally submit the Census report to the Congress which convenes in January. Unless Congress acts within 15 days to change the total number of House seats, the reapportionment is automatic and the Clerk of the House will inform each governor of the number of seats allocated to his state.

Except for a temporary enlargement at the time Alaska and Hawaii were granted statehood, the House has held to the 435-seat size since early in this century. No move to enlarge the membership is anticipated in January.

Only once in the nation's history has a census failed to result in reapportionment of House seats.

In 1920, rural congressmen who were alarmed at the fact that for the first time more Americans lived in cities than on farms blocked passage of a reapportionment bill. But before the 1930 Census, Congress enacted the current law which makes reapportionment automatic unless Congress takes affirmative action to the contrary.

Unemployment Crunch Felt in Smaller Areas

Two major manpower centers were removed from the nation's "substantial" unemployment list this month, reducing the number to 36. But at the same time, the Labor Dept. added 20 smaller areas to the list of those with "substantial" joblessness and three other smaller areas to the "persistent" unemployment category.

"Substantial" unemployment means a jobless rate of 6 percent or more that is expected to continue in the area for at least three months. The term "persistent" unemployment is applied to areas where the jobless rate has been 6 percent or higher for more than a year and at least 50 percent above the national average for several years.

The two major areas deleted from the list of those with substantial unemployment are Saginaw, Mich., and Corpus Christi, Tex. This still leaves nearly one-fourth of the 150 major employment centers in the high unemployment category. Only five major areas were listed in that category last January, the Labor Dept. noted.

There are 611 smaller areas now affected by severe unemployment with 455 classified as persistent and 156 as substantial, the report said.

The 20 smaller areas added to the substantial unemployment list are Eugene, Ore.; Texarkana and Atlanta, Tex.; Sandusky, Mich.; Springfield, Vt.; Alamagordo, Deming and Grants, N.M.; Sayre-Athens-Towanda, Pa.; Buffalo, Cambridge, Crookston, Faribault, Mora, Rush City and Wadena, Minn.; Blountstown, Fla.; Cheraw and Union, S.C., and Sisterville, W. Va.

The three smaller areas added to the persistent unemployment category are Livingston and Red Lodge, Mont., and Dayton, Wash.

Overall, 647 major and smaller areas are suffering from severe unemployment, the Labor Dept. said. Of this number, 188 have substantial unemployment and 459 are experiencing persistent unemployment.

will recognize the justice of our proposals for wage parity with other sectors of the transport industry."

Dennis added that "our optimism and our hope are on a downhill course" and "we see no real chance that railway management will relax its stand-pat position in the negotiations. So, while we negotiate, we are taking major steps to prepare our organization for strike action on Dec. 10."

Meanwhile Chairman J. P. Hiltz of the National Railway Labor Conference, representing about 160 major railroads, turned down a union proposal to exempt passenger, coal for generating electricity, and defense-related freight operations from a shutdown.

Dennis repeated the union offer at the Chicago conference and the other three unions supported it in Washington. Hiltz said "the nature of railroad operations makes it wholly impractical" and besides, the idea is of "dubious legality under the Interstate Commerce Act."

The four unions made wage increase proposals more than a year ago and have since engaged in negotiations, mediation and a Presidential Emergency Board procedure "in an attempt to arrive at a fair and equitable solution," they said.

They identified the major roadblock in negotiations as a Nov. 9 Emergency Board recommendation for seven changes in working rules and management insistence on winning those changes before any wage increase can go into effect.

The board recommended increases of 32.5 percent in seven steps over a three-year period. But the steps are so spaced that actual costs to the railroads would total 16 and one-twelfth percent, Board Chairman Lewis M. Gill revealed.

None of the other improvements asked by the unions in contract terms was covered in the board's recommendations except one—accident insurance coverage for off-track employes.

While the wage offer does constitute a basis for possible agreement, coupling it with a demand for rules changes which would seriously affect the earnings and welfare of union members "is a major barrier," the union men said.

Dennis's union sees the wage offer as needing improvement also. Dennis put the deficiency as about 40 cents an hour—the size of the difference between wages of BRAC members and other workers in transportation.

Smith told newsmen that the diner crews have another pressing problem. Their rules are so outmoded that some dining car workers "must be on the job at least 2.5 times as long as others" to earn their hourly wage, he said.

Union wages under current contracts average $3.60 an hour for the Clerks, $3.45 for the UTU, $3.25 for the Waymen and $3.19 for diner kitchen and table crews, the unions reported.

Road Workers Affirm Union; End Walkout

Oakland, Md.—Garrett County road workers have voted 110-10 in favor of representation by State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1834, thus officially ending one of the longest public employe strikes in the history of American labor.

The representation election came at the end of a 227-day strike for recognition of the union. Votes were counted Nov. 20 before the men returned to their jobs servicing 800 miles of county roads.

Contract negotiations are under way.

The seven-month strike began Apr. 7 when two conservative Republican county commissioners blocked recognition of Local 1834 and refused to talk with union officials.

Amendments Trim Back Scope of Housing Bill

and so-called "dormitory" housing for low-income elderly, handicapped or displaced single persons.

The farm worker provision would allow nonprofit organizations of farm workers to receive loans and grants to provide permanently-constructed housing—in contrast to the dilapidated shacks usually rented by employers—for families and individuals.

Under the "dormitory" programs, occupants would have the privacy of single rooms but common kitchens and other facilities would be provided for tenants.

Another new section of the bill would deal with the problem of businesses in inner-city areas that have been unable to obtain reasonably-priced insurance against theft, burglary and vandalism. If the commercial rates were more than 175 percent of the normal cost of such insurance, the federal government would write and make available its own insurance policies.

Conservative attempts to knock out the $1.5 billion authorization for urban renewal funds were beaten back. But the community development section was killed by a 94-81 teller vote. Under the parliamentary procedure at the time, it was impossible to force a rollcall vote on the issue.

Normally, the bill would go to a House-Senate conference committee to be reconciled with the Senate version. The final draft would then be brought back to each body for approval.

But there were strong indications that the Administration may seek to use parliamentary delaying tactics to block appointment of conferees and forestall any further action before adjournment.

Congressional insistance on moving ahead with housing legislation had embarrassed the Administration which first had promised a major legislative proposal this year and then backed away from the issue under hold-the-budget pressures.

In a letter to all congressmen before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller strongly urged support of comprehensive housing legislation.

"To postpone or to skeletonize any part of this legislation only makes our nation's housing crisis more desperate and the solution more difficult," he stressed, "particularly for those low and moderate income Americans who cannot find adequate shelter."

In other congressional developments:

- A conservative majority of the Senate Finance Committee voted to toughen two provisions of federally-financed welfare programs that had been largely nullified by the Supreme Court. The committee reinstated a one-year residence requirement for welfare applicants, subject to modification by agreement between the state from which the applicant came and the state in which he applied for benefits. It also inserted a modified "man-in-the-house" rule, somewhat less stringent than the provision the Supreme Court overturned.
- In another area, negotiations were under way between Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare over a package of amendments to the Administration's proposed Family Assistance Plan aimed at winning liberal support for the bill.
- A labor-supported effort is planned in the House to improve a restrictive food stamp bill drawn up by the Agriculture Committee and scheduled for early House action

Meany Praises Studies Center Aid to Unions

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is playing a key role in helping unions meet the broadened responsibilities they have assumed over the years, Federation Pres. George Meany told a class of building trades business agents at the center.

As unions are increasing their effectiveness to their members and the communities they serve, the studies center is helping develop more knowledgeable labor leaders, he stressed.

Meany noted that the administration and the functions of unions have become more complex in recent years, especially since the labor movement has broadened its scope of concern for its members both as wage earners and consumers.

"Today, the labor movement is not only responsible to its members, but to all people," he said. He noted as an example that the social legislation and laws for the protection of workers, achieved largely through the efforts of organized labor, benefit all Americans.

Meany's comments were delivered at the studies center's first week-long Institute for Building Trades Business Agents.

The seminar sessions covered labor law, technological changes in the construction industry, federal housing policy, job opportunities for minorities, pension and health programs, collective bargaining, on-site job safety, and the legislative program of the AFL-CIO & Construction Trades Dept.

Thirty-five business agents participated in the seminar, representing individual unions and construction trades councils.

Shopcraft Pay Proposals Cover 100,000 Workers in Six Unions

Railroad unions representing nearly 100,000 shopcraftsmen across the nation served contract proposal notices seeking individual bargaining on properties of 120 major freight and passenger lines.

The notices were followed by the mailing of strike authorization ballots to be returned before the end of December by members of the six unions involved. They are the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, the Railway Carmen, Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and the Firemen & Oilers.

The unions want to start negotiating as soon as possible on proposed contract improvements based on membership responses to questionnaires. They include pay increases of 20 percent a year for each of two years, restoration of a cost-of-living clause dropped from contracts eight years ago, longevity pay and higher shift differentials.

Pres. James E. Yost of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. said the bargaining requests were served on individual railroads through shopcraft system federations. Negotiations will take place "on the property" instead of in central or national bargaining sessions.

By bargaining individually with the railroads instead of jointly, as in the past, the shop unions would be free to reach separate agreements or to call a work stoppage against individual lines. Previous attempts to take such action were frustrated by court injunctions forbidding individual strikes when bargaining was on a nationwide basis.

Yost said wages must be increased sharply in this round of negotiations. Shopcraft employes, he said, "have not fully participated in the general wage progress made by other American workers, and their wage rates are now substantially below the rates paid to comparable employes in other industries, particularly transportation."

The new contract proposals were drafted by Railroad Dept. officers and "enthusiastically endorsed" by all shopcraft general union chairmen at a recent meeting in Chicago, Yost said.

Union contracts under the Railway Labor Act remain in effect unless notice of intent to change them is served at specified times. The Act provides that labor and management shall meet within 30 days to negotiate. If no agreement is reached within that period or an extended one, strike notices may be served, subject to a prolonged mediation process.

Four of the six shopcraft unions filed identical proposals to start the 1970 round of negotiations. The Firemen & Oilers filed a separate notice excluding minimum pay rates, already the subject of negotiations between that union and managements, and a reduction in job grades from 300 to 7. The Sheet Metal union filed separately also. It asks a 1973 increase based on the composite rate for equipment maintenance employes in union shops in the trucking and airline industries, an end to a rule permitting limited crossing of craft picket lines, and premium pay for Saturday and Sunday work.

The shopcrafts are not involved in the nationwide negotiations affecting 425,000 other railroad employes represented by the Railway & Airline Clerks, the Maintenance of Way Employes, United Transportation Union and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes for dining car crews.

Shoppers Urged To Look for Label

Look for the union label when Christmas shopping, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. urged all union members and their families.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis said in a message to unions "we exhort our fellow members to help one another" by purchasing gifts bearing the union label and to use the services of businesses displaying the shop card, store card or service button.

"These emblems represent brotherhood," Lewis wrote. "They assist in securing jobs and help provide a better life for union men and their families."

We Won't Buy It!

THE COUNCIL of Economic Advisers contends that wage increases are the "chief concern" and concludes that workers should bear the major burden of the Administration's game plan to slow down inflation.

I don't buy that and American workers won't buy that.

The fact is that workers and wages did not cause this inflation and they have not profited by it. They are among its chief victims and they are not happy about it.

The report considers wages only as a cost of doing business. There is nothing in its 41 pages about wages as family incomes or as a source of purchasing power. There is no mention of the Labor Dept.'s statistical report of Nov. 23 that the buying power of the average nonsupervisory worker's weekly take-home pay in October was 2 percent less than a year ago and even below 1965.

The document is heavily weighted against wage increases for workers, but is very solicitous about profits of business—reporting only that profit margins increased this year and "some further rise is to be expected."

The attack on the UAW settlement with General Motors is unwarranted. Auto workers' wages have long trailed increases in the cost of living. The settlement provides a catch-up and modest gains in buying power—a most responsible agreement.

Nor is the cause of industrial peace promoted by attempting to undermine the recommendations of the President's Emergency Board in the railroad disputes, which were meager and unsatisfactory.

Workers are willing to do their share to halt inflation and balance the economy. The AFL-CIO has said repeatedly that we would accept restraints on wages, if similar controls were placed equally on all other costs and incomes, including prices, profits, dividends, rents and all the different kinds of executive compensation.

We believe that the economy has to be made to work for all the people, including the poor, the aged, the jobless, the untrained and all the others who need it most and get so little out of it.

The AFL-CIO believes that the only answer to economic inequity is to restore equity. The only policy that meets the problems of unemployment is a policy of full employment. The only answer to maldistribution of the wealth American workers help create is to give workers a bigger share of the pie.

Willard E. Shelton

WILLARD E. SHELTON, who served as managing editor and political columnist for this paper for 10 years, was once described as "acidly liberal," a phrase that uniquely caught the careful but courageous reporter, the realistic progressive and the bruising honesty of his dedication to American democracy.

His was a major voice in American liberalism from the Thirties through the Sixties, a widely respected voice that never hesitated to call the turn on those who would corrupt the traditions of democracy and the moral principles that he held sacred.

His was a major voice, too, in the labor press where he set new standards as a writer and editor that have strongly influenced the course of labor journalism.

We who live and work to uphold these standards and principles mourn him deeply.

Political Satire More Obscene Than Adults-Only Sex Movie

By John P. Roche

THOUGH I DONATED three years of my life to the Army of the United States, I was never a model soldier. The problem was that I was born with a caustic wit (known to First Sergeants as a "wise "), a flash temper, and absolutely no taste for witless routine. This combination made life somewhat lively both for me and my long-suffering commanding officers until a smart colonel worked out a modus vivendi: I did all his work and he protected me from the courts-martial that were invariably looming somewhere in the background. It was a good political arrangement: when he got his eagles, he even had me promoted to Staff Sergeant.

I put this in the record just to make it clear that the operation of the United States Army in World War II never impressed me with its efficiency, and with sufficient encouragement there are stories I can tell that might lead one to think that Japanese War Bonds were not as big a risk as is often supposed. None of my stories, however, can hold a candle to those narrated by Edmund Love in his neglected little classic, "War Is a Private Affair," so I will pass on to the point of this reminiscence: that I doubt if anybody ever matched my record as an anti-militarist.

Yet last week I got up and walked out of a movie, "Catch 22," feeling a strong need to find a bathroom and retch—and an equally strong compulsion to find the producer and break his jaw. Never having read the book, I went to the show anticipating a "humorous" satire on the Air Force's role in Italy during World War II. I will never know how the movie ended, but by my standards it was rapidly moving towards a triumph of political obscenity.

Indeed, fully recognizing that I am something of an ideological nut, I found this film far more obscene than any of the silly sex stuff—"I am Swedish (Boring)," "The Dykes of Copenhagen," etc.—because it took the worst tragedy that has ever hit mankind, the war against Nazi Germany, and turned it into an episode from "The Godfather." It was just a racket.

THE AUDIENCE, largely composed of teenagers and people of college age, seemed to think the whole bit was hilarious. The Luftwaffe and the 15th Air Force as components in a criminal syndicate! What a great idea! They were practically rolling in the aisles. And as I looked at them and listened to their giggles while the Establishment took another one in the chops, I went into a slow burn.

High school and college friends of mine went off to fight in what Winston Churchill miscalled "the soft underbelly" of Festung Europa. A good dozen of them are still there in the military cemeteries outside of Monte Cassino, Salerno, and Anzio. I emerged intact from my unheroic war—they have been dead a quarter of a century. And they fought and died to help destroy a monstrous brand of totalitarianism—not as "soldiers" in a Mafia family war.

No sense of humor, Roche? Well, maybe so. But I'm glad I left when I did. The way that "satire" was shaping up, the final scene might well have shown that Auschwitz was just an advertising venture sponsored by an enterprising gas company. And I might well be in jail for felonious assault.

Meany Salutes USO On 30th Anniversary

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany saluted the United Service Organization in a letter to Gen. Emmett O'Donnell, USO president, noting that the organization will reach its 30th anniversary next Feb. 4.

Meany observed that as long as the nation is threatened by totalitarian powers, it will need soldiers, sailors and airmen, and "as long as we have our military we shall need also the USO."

He praised the USO for providing "a bit of home away from home" for service men and women during the past three decades.

He also saluted the millions of union members who have contributed to the USO as givers, volunteers, entertainers and hosts, and pledged the continued support of the AFL-CIO to these efforts.

Misplaced Blame:

Escalator Pay Hikes Reflect Inflation; They Don't Cause It

The following is excerpted from an article in the Nov. 20, 1970 issue of the Wall Street Journal by Leonard Woodcock, president of the United Auto Workers, entitled "Escalation Isn't Inflation."

WORKERS do not bargain for increased wages merely because it gives them pleasure to see larger numbers on their paychecks. They are concerned (even though they may not use economists' jargon) with their "real wages"—with what their paychecks will buy. They bargain to improve their families' living standards.

In the face of rising prices, they can achieve that goal in one of two ways. They can negotiate fixed wage increases that anticipate future price-level increases, or they can negotiate escalator clauses which commit their employers to adjust money wages if and when—and after—price-level increases materialize. Long-term contracts emphasize the need to do one or the other.

Under escalator clauses future increases in unit labor costs are conditional rather than certain. Escalator wage increases are made only if there has been a prior increase in the general level of prices. The escalators remain inoperative if the price level remains stable. Thus, wage increases under escalator clauses do not cause but rather are merely reflections of and reactions to inflation generated by other causes.

Discussing the origin of the UAW-GM wage formula in his book, "My Years With General Motors," Alfred P. Sloan wrote:

"The natural inclination of unions in an inflationary period is to bargain for wage increases high enough to allow for future price increases; and in anticipating these high prices, the wage gains tend to push them up still higher."

The escalator part of the wage formula was intended to avoid the necessity for such anticipatory wage increases.

The escalator was recognized by GM as one of the two essential conditions required in order for the corporation to obtain the industrial-relations stability of long-term contracts. The other was the so-called "annual improvement factor" whose purpose, as C. E. Wilson, then president of GM, said, was ". . . to promise in advance a yearly increase in real wages." Fulfillment of that promise requires automatic adjustment of money wages to changes in prices.

Professor Alvin P. Hansen, one of America's great economists, demonstrated at some length the counter-inflationary effect of escalator clauses in an article published in Challenge magazine for November-December 1966.

OPPONENTS OF ESCALATORS concede that escalation cannot initiate the inflationary process. But they go on to argue that unit-labor-cost increases flowing from escalation contribute to the prolongation of the inflationary spiral. This argument ignores several points.

First, once an inflation has started, people generally, including workers, tend to assume the continuance or acceleration of recent rates of price increase. Thus, a union that might normally settle for fixed future wage increases (in addition to amounts intended to improve its members' living standards) in anticipation of perhaps 1 percent or 2 percent inflation annually would feel compelled, in today's situation, to try to protect its members against the possibility of future price increases at the rate of 6 percent or more.

Second, money wages always respond to inflation—even (and often more quickly because there are no fixed-term contracts) in industries where the workers are unorganized. To block wage increases despite rising prices would be to distort the distribution of income to the disadvantage of workers and unfairly to impose upon them the burdens and sacrifices of combating inflation. That is not possible for very long in a democracy.

Third, the argument misplaces the blame for secondary price increases based upon unit-labor-cost increases resulting from the operation of escalator clauses. It is not the escalators that are responsible but, rather, the initial price increases that trigger the escalators into operations.

As Alfred L. Malabre, Jr., showed in the Journal for Aug. 5, 1968, the initial price increases that touch off the inflationary spiral are not caused by wage or unit-labor-cost increases. Wages play a passive role at the inception of the inflationary spiral. They respond—after a lag—to price-level increases resulting from non-wage sources. Unlike inflation-anticipating fixed wage increases, which add momentum to the spiral, inflation-compensating escalator clauses assure that wages will continue to be a passive factor after the spiral has been set in motion.

The only real choice open is not between protection of wages against inflation and no protection but rather between the means used to obtain protection. Escalators are counter-inflationary because they avoid built-in cost increases and thereby enable stabilization efforts to focus on non-wage factors tending to perpetuate the spiral.

In Education-Business Dealings:

Marland Fails to Understand What Conflict of Interest Is

SIDNEY P. MARLAND, JR., the Administration's choice for U.S. Commissioner of Education, either doesn't know what conflict of interest is or fails to realize how it can seriously hamper the objectivity and effectiveness of high public officials.

That charge was levelled in a network radio interview by AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis. He related how Marland, as head of the Institute for Educational Development, a major corporation doing business with school systems, tried to dissuade the New Jersey Commissioner of Education from resigning as a director of the corporation, despite a direct contractual relationship between the corporation and the state of New Jersey.

"What he would do as U.S. Commissioner of Education, I don't know," Davis said, but it is clear that "he doesn't really understand what conflict of interest is, or, in the alternative, doesn't worry too much about it." Davis pointed out that as Commissioner of Education, Marland would administer and allocate funds for educational programs that will run to some $91 billion a year by 1975.

Predicting that Marland would "push programs that would encourage more business activity in and control of public schools," Davis said a high Administration spokesman recently told the AFL-CIO that "it isn't so bad" to have public schools managed by the private business sector.

He said that although Marland claimed the IED is only geared to provide "advice and counsel" to public school systems, their charter goes much further, allowing them to operate educational demonstration and development programs, as well as "sell or lease any equipment developed under their programs."

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System, Davis said Marland's appointment as Commissioner of Education would have a "chilling effect on relationships between school administrators and teachers unions." He described Marland's attitude toward teacher organizations as "reluctant," or, at best, "negative."

"Valid collective bargaining demands a real two-way street," Davis declared. That would be hard to achieve with school boards seeking aid and cooperation from Marland, he added.

Reporters questioning Davis were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

THE 92ND CONGRESS which will convene next January may well become an unusually historic one; it will be laying the groundwork for the highly important 1972 presidential election and it will mark the launching of far-reaching reorganization in both the House and Senate. We can expect a vital debate on seniority as a method of choosing chairmen of House committees.

The stage has been set for both developments.

Under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970 procedures in both bodies have been democratized considerably, most of them affecting the House. The way is opened, too, for curtailing the frequently criticized conduct of committee chairmen and for making sure that the public knows how congressmen have voted on important bills.

The 181-year practice of not recording teller votes on important amendments to legislation on the House floor will be ended, thus preventing congressmen from voting one way on unrecorded votes and the other way on final passage or defeat.

Limitations also are put on the power of committee chairmen to bury legislation by not calling it up or by failing to call committee meetings or similar devices which have undercut the whole legislative process.

Both the Democrats and Republicans have set up committees to study and report to their congressional colleagues on the long and bitterly debated question of seniority in the election of committee chairmen in the case of the majority party and ranking members of the minority.

THE REPUBLICAN task force, under the chairmanship of Rep. Barber B. Conable, Jr., of New York, has already prepared a tentative resolution which will be presented to the Republican Committee on Committees when the new Congress convenes next January. This committee is based on geographical distribution of Republican seats in the House.

The Committee on Committees is to make its recommendations for chairman or ranking minority member, as the case may be. The recommendation is to be voted upon by the full Republican Conference. In the event that the recommendation is rejected, the nomination is referred back to the committee. Independent nominations are barred.

What is crucial about this procedure is the statement that the nominee "need not be the member with the longest consecutive service" on the committee in question. The senior member thus is not barred, but he is not to be named solely on the basis of seniority as is now the practice.

The parallel Democratic committee, under the chairmanship of Rep. Julia Butler Hansen of Washington, has not yet reached the same point as the Republicans'. The Democrats are still considering their position and are expected to report to the Democratic Caucus during December with the final decision to be made in January.

So far the committee of 11 members has examined a number of proposals for handling the seniority question, including such possibilities as setting a limit to the age at which a chairman may serve, limitation on length of service as chairman, limiting the number of important chairmanships that may be held—in brief, the wide variety of proposals that have been made over the years to correct the abuses that are inherent in the seniority program.

It is clear that the battle against seniority, long-waged by some of the most progressive members of Congress, the subject of numerous studies and sometimes violent debate, is coming to a head. The power of the Speaker of the House, once mighty as it was in the days of Speaker Joe Cannon, has been limited if not broken. The power of committee chairmen is now also at stake.

At issue is not simply the question of age, as the reformers have been careful to point out, but the issue of selection by ability rather than by longevity in terms of service in the House.

Both Democrats and Republicans now will have a priceless opportunity to use criteria other than seniority as a guage of the kind of leadership that will best serve the public interest.

At Dinner Honoring Stulberg:

Soviet Role Assailed In Mideast Conflict

New York—The Soviet Union was assailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for its role in blocking efforts for peace between the Arab countries and Israel.

The conflict in the Middle East runs far deeper than the differences between the Arabs and Israelis, Meany observed as he addressed a Jewish Labor Committee dinner honoring Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

"The open and vital part played by the Soviet Union in support of its Arab satellites that have been publicly committed for years to the total extermination of Israel and its people is to me an indication that Russia really fears a peaceful and progressive Middle East," Meany declared.

He said that peace in that area of the world "could possibly stand in the way of Soviet designs for the control of the Mediterranean as a springboard for further efforts to dominate the entire world."

Calling attention to current Soviet policy, Meany said:

"Let those who believe the Cold War is ended, let those who believe there is some profit in doing business with the Soviets, let those who believe that you can make unilateral concessions and buy peace, let them read the Lenin plan that is spelled out—the plan for world domination."

In contrast, Meany said that Americans look for the Arab and Israeli people to live in peace and harmony.

"We want to see them join hands in developing the great natural resources of this historic area of the world for the benefit of the plain [illegible]om both sides—without foreign domination," he stressed.

"American labor understands only too well what is at stake," Meany said, adding "we know from long experience that we cannot make progress in an atmosphere devoid of freedom.

"That is why we support our government in its effort to preserve freedom in the Eastern Mediterranean."

Meany said that the struggle for freedom and justice is worldwide and he lashed out at the injustice and discrimination behind the Iron Curtain. He noted that 50 years of Communist party control reveals that "security without justice" has little meaning for the people of the Jewish faith or origin in the Soviet Union.

Similar oppression is experienced by White Russians, Moslem Russians, Estonians, Lithuanians, Latvians and workers in other parts of eastern Europe, he added.

Stulberg received the annual labor human rights award of the JLC's National Trade Union Council.

"Under his leadership," Stulberg's citation read, "the ILGWU has strengthened its role as the gateway through which workers of all races, creeds and colors enter the mainstream of American life."

Meany also cited the JLC for its assistance in the struggle for justice of farm workers in the California grape vineyards.

Other speakers at the dinner included Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP; Charles Zimmerman, JLC president; Emanuel Muravchik, JLC executive director, and Israel's Jacob Barmore, minister of Israel's permanent mission to the United Nations.

Senate Urged to Reject Nomination Of Marland for Top Education Post

"If Sidney Marland feels 'uneasy' with teacher unionism, we feel 'uneasy' with Sidney Marland," Biemiller declared.

He further questioned Marland's ability to be objective in dealing with business firms as Commissioner of Education in the light of his past association with the Institute for Educational Development.

Biemiller said labor was not raising the question of personal profit, but did charge that "cronyism and favoritism" are "rampant in the record of the commissioner-designate."

He noted that Marland had proposed tax incentives for business to help "close the circle" of education, industry and government. The AFL-CIO firmly opposes this idea as "not an education program" but "tax relief for industry," Biemiller declared.

Marland's educational philosophy, like the Nixon Administration's philosophy, is based on a "de-emphasis of federal responsibility," the AFL-CIO statement said. It charged that this is nothing more than "federal irresponsibility."

Biemiller said Marland's answers to questions put by committee members about his policy plans and ideas were vague. He noted that Marland had pleaded ignorance of specific fields of legislation several times during the first two days of the hearings and urged the committee to question the nominee more deeply.

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) agreed with this point, terming Marland's answers a "wave-riding response" that gave no "sense of direction" for the Office of Education.

The AFL-CIO statement also expressed opposition to Administration plans to consolidate various education programs into a "gigantic bloc grant approach" and questioned Marland's position on the proposal. It said his answer to a question by Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R. I.) was "certainly not responsive or enlightening."

The problems of schools are "national in scope and require national answers," Biemiller stressed. The federal government, he said, cannot avoid the problem by calling on private industry and cutting funds, and research and demonstration projects cannot be substituted for full funding of education programs.

The AFL-CIO charged that Marland "totally fails to understand the national needs," and that his educational philosophy is "hardly in accord with recent congressional action."

It also questioned Marland on his civil rights philosophy, citing a Newsweek article reporting that after a "90-minute, closed-door session" with the nominee, Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) withdrew his objections to the appointment.

Biemiller called Marland's proposal for job entry testing "intellectual snobbery" that would "put another hurdle between poverty-bound youth and a good paying job."

The statement concluded that "this is a sorry nomination by an Administration with a sorry educational record."

Selden, in his testimony, expressed full agreement with the points made by the AFL-CIO statement.

He charged that Marland has consistently tried to develop a "paternalistic relationship" with teachers. The AFT, Selden said, regards the Marland nomination as part of the "continuing failure by the Administration to face up to the educational needs of the schools."

The fact that the AFT and the AFL-CIO are both opposed to Marland, Selden asserted, ought to be reason enough for urging the President to nominate someone else to the position of Commissioner of Education.

Unionists in Peace Corps Train Workers of Developing Nations

The developing nations of the world may vary greatly in their natural resources and in their problems, but they have one urgent need in common: skilled manpower.

In the November issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine, Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters tells how Peace Corps volunteers from organized labor are passing on their skills to the workmen of emerging nations.

Raftery, an AFL-CIO vice president, is the labor representative on the National Advisory Council of the Peace Corps.

Volunteers ranging in age from their early 20s to their 60s and in skills from machinist and telephone installer to plumber and carpenter are part of this worker-to-worker program, Raftery notes.

"In Guinea, West Africa, the Peace Corps mechanics program has had an extraordinary impact," the article reports. "Initially, a crash program put the bus and truck system of Conakry back on the road. Twenty-three diesel mechanics and machinists have been training Guineans to repair and maintain the equipment, man repair depots around the country and overhaul $5 million worth of diesel power generating equipment.

"The Peace Corps effort in Guinea reflects America in several ways. The team includes three Mexican-Americans, two blacks, two Job Corps graduates and a few liberal arts generalists."

The Auto Workers contributed bus parts, and General Motors and the Hyster Co. provided educational materials and specialized training.

In Iran, where the rate of economic growth has exceeded 10 percent per year for the past five years, the Peace Corps is aiding the government in expanding its vocational training centers with a view to tripling student enrollment to 50,000.

"The Peace Corps responded to Iran's requests with a strong team of mechanics, machinists, welders and electronics technicians," Raftery reports.

To meet such demands, he observes, the Peace Corps 1971 skilled trades program has urgent needs for construction specialists to work in the Congo; mechanics, machinists and electricians for India, and a wide variety of skills elsewhere in Africa, South Asia, the Middle East, Latin America and Micronesia.

Raftery personally toured a Peace Corps training project in Micronesia last summer on Ponape, one of the eastern Caroline Islands where Peace Corps volunteers are helping natives construct an 80-mile beltway around the island.

To the 12,000 inhabitants of the island living in isolated huts around its perimeter, the road means economic, social and political development.

"With a road, agriculture can expand, since farmers will be able to get more crops to market. People will be able to travel to jobs and training centers. Schools and teachers can be pooled to raise the quality of education. Better health care and housing and greater cultural opportunities could be made available to those now isolated."

What's more important, the article suggests, is that the Ponape Transportation Board, created and funded by two volunteers, is doing something else besides building a road. The Transportation Board has been steadily expanding its capabilities and has the potential of becoming a major source of employment and training for Ponapeans.

It was late last year that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Peace Corps Dir. John Blatchford agreed on a cooperative effort to recruit skilled workers and their families. In February 1970, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reaffirmed labor's traditional support of the Peace Corps as "a program we wholeheartedly endorse."

Raftery emhasizes in his article that labor is providing the hard work that is rarely glamorous, but always necessary to the progress of the developing nations.

"This is the kind of practical idealism we can contribute to others. In return we will gain understanding and respect for the cultures of other people."

Meany Rejects Plan To Sacrifice Wages

mists said their "chief concern" was with wages.

The solution, the report suggested, is for unions that have not yet had their round at the bargaining table to accept smaller increases than the pattern which has emerged over the past year.

It complained that the recent General Motors auto settlement "substantially exceeds" the anticipated gain in national productivity and would have an inflationary effect "if generalized throughout the economy."

It even had some harsh words for the railroad wage settlement recommended by a presidential panel because it assumes that living costs will continue to rise substantially over the next few years.

Backing up the "jawboning" was a "carrot and stick" approach by the Administration.

The council report agreed that the present high unemployment and "slack" in the economy "is not a condition that can be allowed to persist for long."

Government policies "should now aim more vigorously at expansion," the report conceded.

That was the carrot—the implied promise that the Administration policies that plunged the nation into a recession would be reversed.

And then there was the stick—the warning against wage increases the Administration considers too high.

That, the report asserted, "would be a recipe for permanent rapid inflation—and also for persistent unemployment, because the government would be bound to try to check the inflation by generally restrictive policies."

It may seem "unfair to some" that those who come to the bargaining table later settle for less, the report conceded. But it argued that such a sacrifice is the only way to stop the "cost-price spiral."

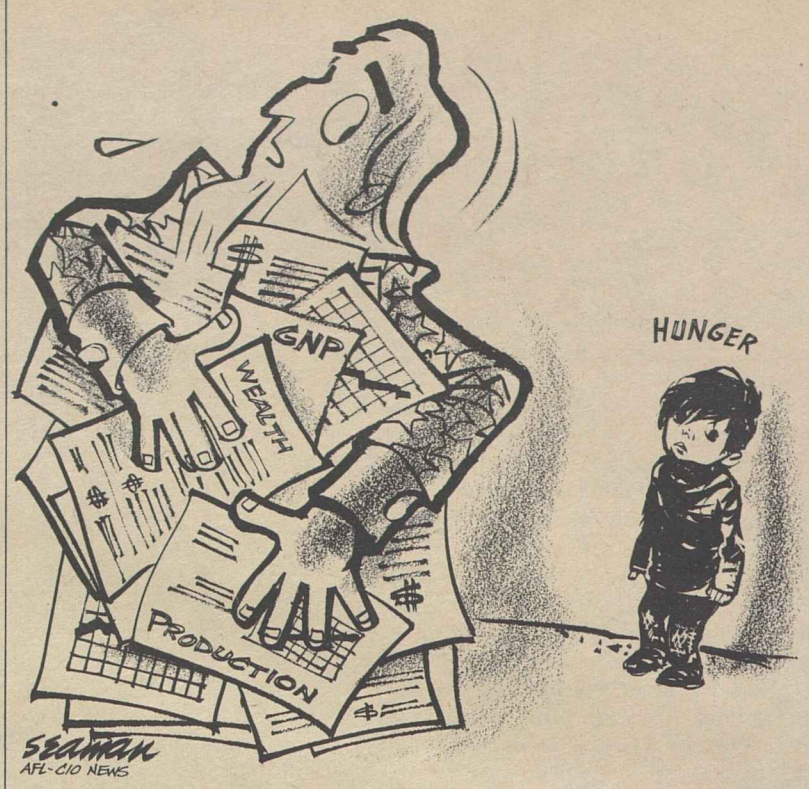
Meany noted that the report "considers wages only as a cost of doing business" and says nothing about "wages as family income or as a source of purchasing power."

The so-called inflation alert, he emphasized, has "not a word about interst rates, which are an important cost throughout the economy. Nor is there a word in the report about soaring bank profits."

Meany termed the attack on the Auto Workers settlement "unwarranted." In fact, he stressed, it is "a most responsible agreement" that "provides a catch-up and modest gains in buying power."



The economic council, Meany added, is not serving "the cause of industrial peace" by trying "to undermine the recommendations of the President's Emergency Board in the railroad disputes, which were in themselves meager and unsatisfactory."

Meany reiterated the AFL-CIO's willingness to accept restraints on wages "if similar controls were placed equally on all other costs and incomes, including prices, profits, dividends, rents and all the different kinds of executive compensation."

Labor's position, he said, is that "the economy has to be made to work for all the people, including the poor, the aged, the jobless, the untrained and all the others who need it the most and get so little out of it."

And as for the demand for a one-sided sacrifice by workers, "I don't buy that and American workers won't buy that."

'We're Number One–I Think!'

House Rules Committee Kills Consumer Agency

Legislation to create an independent federal agency to speak up for consumers passed the Senate by a one-sided margin but died in the House Rules Committee on a 7-7 tie vote.

The Rules Committee action came just one day after the Senate, with bipartisan support, had voted 74-4 to establish a Consumer Protection Agency which would be the spokesman for consumer interests before federal regulatory bodies and in court proceedings. A companion Council of Consumer Advisers would be set up in the Executive Office of the President to coordinate federal consumer programs and prepare policy recommendations.

The Nixon Administration had opposed an independent agency and had sought to relegate consumer protection to a division of the Justice Dept.

But the support for the independent agency bill was so strong that the Administration did not even try to substitute its proposal on the Senate floor and the only efforts to amend the bill were aimed at strengthening the agency's independence of the White House.

A companion bill in the House had been approved by the Government Operations Committee on July 30 and had been awaiting Rules Committee clearance for more than four months.

At the urging of the House leadership, Rules Committee Chairman William L. Colmer finally agreed to let his committee vote on whether to let the bill go to the House floor.

Its two sponsors—Democrat Benjamin S. Rosenthal (N.Y.) and Florence P. Dwyer (N.J.)—were joined by a bipartisan group of congressional supporters in urging the committee to let the House vote on the bill.

But with one liberal absent—Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.)—Colmer and the conservatives on the committee had the votes to block any affirmative action. First the committee rejected, 7-7, a motion to defer a vote on a rule until Bolling's return. Then by the same tie vote the motion to clear the legislation for the House floor was lost.

Efforts may be made to revive the legislation. But with Congress pushing towards a pre-Christmas adjournment and a heavy backlog of legislation awaiting action, it would be an uphill fight.

Two former consumer advisers to Pres. Johnson—Esther Peterson and Betty Furness—strongly endorsed the independent agency concept at a news conference.

The present position of adviser to the President for consumer affairs is "a nice little office," Mrs. Furness said. But "it is not strong enough. It could be wiped out some morning by a President having indigestion."

Senate Panel Votes Changes In Trade Bill

ports. But the tax loss to the government could have amounted to more than the value of any increase in export sales.

Also rejected was a House-passed repeal of the American Selling Price system of tariff valuation of chemicals. The AFL-CIO had warned that its repeal could result in the loss of thousands of jobs in the chemical industry.

In other areas, though, the Senate panel bowed to Administration objections and eliminated sections of the House bill that would have made it easier for all industries hurt by imports to obtain relief either through tariffs or import quotas.

The House bill would have granted automatic relief to an industry based on an arithmetical formula for determining injury in which both the share of the market and wages paid to foreign workers as compared with U.S. workers would be considered.

A key provision of both the House and Senate bills is a quota on textile and shoe imports. The Administration has somewhat ambiguously endorsed textile imports although opposed to restrictions on shoe imports. The President has been silent on the legislation, but a White House spokesman added encouragement to the drive for textile quotas by reporting no progress in current negotiations with Japan on voluntary quotas.

The Senate bill will be open to amendments on the floor.

A bloc of senators opposed to trade restrictions had hinted at a possible filibuster or other end-of-the-session delaying tactics. The Finance Committee, by a 10-6 vote, rejected a motion to send the bill to the floor as separate legislation. The reasoning presumably was that opponents would hesitate to block consideration of a package bill including politically-popular increases in social security benefits.

Massive Federal Action Urged To Pull Nation From Recession

New York—"Decisive and massive" government action to restore full employment and pull the nation out of recession was prescribed by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger.

The "cautious and half-hearted measures" being considered by the Nixon Administration won't do the job, Goldfinger warned.

Goldfinger told the Manufacturing Chemists Association that the Administration had "engineered" the recession to cool off the economy but is gravely underestimating the stimulus needed to turn it around.

Unless a bold, expansionary policy is adopted, he stressed, unemployment will continue to edge up and the nation will face "another year of lost opportunities and increased slack."

To achieve a "real economic growth" in the 6-to-7-percent range—double the rate likely under the conservative policies being considered by the Administration—Goldfinger proposed:

- A large, temporary deficit in the federal government's budget for the coming fiscal year.

"It is much wiser policy to plan for a large budget deficit to lift the economy and gradually boost federal revenues from increased employment and incomes," he said, "than to stumble into a budget deficit as a result of a slump in tax revenues, jobs and earnings."

- An expansionary monetary policy to provide enough money and credit, at considerably lower interest rates, to finance the needed expansion.

Lower interest rates would also reduce inflationary pressures, Goldfinger stressed. "About half of the cost of housing to the consumer is composed of interest charges," he noted.

The increased federal expenditures to stimulate the economy, he urged, should be in such areas as housing, community facilities, education and health care.

Goldfinger acknowledged that the policies labor is advocating would bring from Administration economists "moans, cries and shouts about the danger of a renewed acceleration of inflation."

But, he stressed, increased production and full use of the nation's industrial capacity would translate into lower unit labor costs. "And lower interest rates would reduce cost-and-price pressures all along the line."

Goldfinger warned that continued "economic waste" in the form of unemployed workers and idle productive capacity would breed continued social problems, "particularly with high and probably rising unemployment among returning GI's, Negroes and youth."

He acknowledged that there is little chance that the Administration will turn of its own accord to the needed expansionary policies. But he expressed the hope that, "with appropriate prodding from Congress and the electorate," it could be induced to take the actions that are necessary to overcome the "prolonged stagnation" of the economy.

Factory Hiring Hits 6-Year Low Point

The demand for factory labor has dropped to its lowest point since May 1964 and layoffs still are increasing, according to the Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The decline in demand for factory workers continued in October with new hires dropping from 27 to 24 per 1,000 workers. Compared to a year ago, the rate has declined by 12 new hires per 1,000 workers.

The bureau said that the continuing decline in October was due largely to the effects of the automobile strike which continued through that month. While the striking workers themselves are not counted as turnover actions, workers indirectly affected by the strike would be included.

Gulf Area Crafts Get Outreach Aid

The Mobile-Pensacola Building & Construction Trades Council has received a $57,141 Labor Dept. contract to launch an Apprenticeship Outreach project in the Alabama-Florida Gulf Coast area.

The one-year contract, the first granted by the Labor Dept. in the two cities, calls for recruitment and preparation of about 350 minority group youths to qualify for 35 apprenticeship openings in the building trades.

Labor Dept. Issues New Union Catalog

The Labor Dept. has issued a new edition of its Directory of National and International Labor Unions in the United States as of 1969.

In addition to listing unions and their officials, the directory provides facts on membership and structure and developments in the labor movement between 1967 and 1969. Unions outside the AFL-CIO are included in the listings.

The directory — Bulletin 1665—can be obtained for $1.25 from the U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Bids Nixon Act Boldly to Stem Slump

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called for "bold action" to pull the nation out of its slump and Federation Pres. George Meany warned that a new threat of repressive legislation is the "wrong medicine" for an ailing economy.

The threat came from Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur F. Burns who, Meany noted, was the strategist for the Administration's recession-breeding economic "game plan."

Burns suggested in a widely-publicized speech that "further steps" may be needed if labor doesn't heed the Administration's request to lower its voice at the bargaining table and settle for smaller pay hikes.

His suggestions included:

- Compulsory arbitration of major labor disputes.
- Suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of prevailing area wage scales on federally-financed construction projects.
- Exemption of teenagers from the federal minimum wage.
- Scrapping of local building construction codes.
- An advisery wage-price review board.

While workers' wages would be held down by these various devices, Burns suggested a new tax break for business to spur the economy—"the liberalization of depreciation allowances to stimulate plant modernization."

His "trickle down" proposals, Meany charged, would "roll America back to the 19th Century."

The effect would be to "wreck the minimum wage law, the nation's best weapon in the war against poverty."

The compulsory arbitration proposal, Meany warned, would "destroy freedom for workers by hamstringing collective bargaining."

And his plan to give corporations "an undeserved tax cut" would merely "shift the tax burden onto the shoulders of workers," Meany retorted.

Three days before Burns spoke out with his get-tough plan, Pres. Nixon conceded that the nation has "paid a price" in the form of higher unemployment for the Administration's efforts to cool off the economy.

Nixon told the National Association of Manufacturers that the worst of the inflation is over and the Administration has now embarked on a modest expansionary policy based on a temporary bud-

Railroad Strike Is Barred, Congress Votes Pay Boost

TAXICAB DRIVERS on strike in New York City stand around fire near a taxi garage during cold snap. Taxi Drivers Local 3036 represents 36,000 drivers and 1,200 inside workers who walked out in a contract dispute with owners of cab fleets. The strikers want better wages, pensions and other benefits and oppose any reduction in commissions.

Court Issues Order Restraining Unions

By Eugene A. Kelly

Congress stepped into the long dispute over wage increases for 425,000 railroad workers by passing emergency legislation forbidding a strike by four unions or a lockout by the nation's major carriers before Mar. 1.

Coupled with the no-strike or lockout order was a provision for an immediate, temporary pay increase of 13.5 percent for workers who have waited some 18 months for a raise.

Pres. Nixon signed the emergency bill as soon as it was presented to him, and a Washington federal judge granted a petition by the railroads for a temporary order restraining a strike for 10 days. It was the second time in less than a year that the courts had acted to prevent rail workers from exercising the right to strike.

The emergency legislation was passed by Congress 59 minutes after members of the four unions began a walkout at 12:01 a.m., Dec. 10. The President, in signing it, said he did so although the pay-raise portion was not balanced by language "that would increase productivity and cut back the inflationary effect of the pay increases."

A key element in the dispute has been the railroads' insistence on changes in union work rules negotiated over the years. The refusal of the carriers to grant any wage increase unless the unions accept the rules changes has blocked a settlement and stymied talks that began more than a year ago, according to union negotiators.

Three unions—the United Transportation Union, the Maintenance of Way Employes and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes—issued back-to-work orders soon after the court order was served.

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Rail-

Food Stamp Bill Facing House Battle

A bipartisan move to improve a "bare cupboard" food stamp bill drawn up by the conservative House Agriculture Committee has labor's strong support, the AFL-CIO told congressmen.

The goal of the labor-endorsed substitute bill is to eliminate hunger in America by providing national eligibility standards for food stamps, coupled with greatly increased federal funds.

A similar bill was passed by the Senate last year. But the House committee, after sitting on the legislation for 11 months, endorsed a restrictive measure that would leave the program's fate largely in the hands of the states.

The House committee version would also require the states to assume a part of the cost of the program while both the Senate version and the bipartisan substitute would provide full federal financing.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed the substitute, which will be proposed by Representatives Albert H. Quie (R-

Labor-Backed Plan:

Public Job Program Sent to White House

Congress passed a multi-billion dollar manpower training bill that includes a labor-supported public service jobs program and a bipartisan group of mayors mounted a campaign to urge the President to sign the legislation.

The bill enacted was a conference committee's compromise between a smaller-scaled House-passed measure that the Administration had somewhat reluctantly endorsed and a bigger Senate bill that the White House had opposed.

The key issue—for both supporters and opponents—was the extent of the new public service jobs program which is designed to provide meaningful employment for several hundred thousand persons who can't find jobs in private industry.

House Republicans had refused to sign the conference report and led a fight to kill the legislation by voting down the compromise agreement.

In a letter to all congressmen before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said labor considers the legislation "of major importance to the country's economic well-being."

Stressing that the highest unemployment rate in seven years makes prompt action imperative, Biemiller told House members that in labor's opinion "a vote against this conference report would be a vote of indifference toward the nation's economic plight."

The legislation would enable cities, counties, states and non-profit groups such as community hospi-

5.8% Unemployment Highest in 7.5 Years

By John R. Oravec

A bigger than usual rise in unemployment in November and a drop in nonfarm jobs pushed the nation's jobless rate up to 5.8 percent, the highest level in seven and a half years.

The Labor Dept. reported that after seasonal adjustments 4.8 million workers were out of jobs and looking for work.

Since November 1969 when the jobless rate was 3.5 percent of the workforce, unemployment has risen 1.9 million. This includes 905,000 adult men, 565,000 adult women and 430,000 teenagers.

AFL-CIO officials, reacting to the continuing rise in the jobless rate, called the situation "tragic," adding "we wished that our predictions hadn't been so accurate."

Meany Asks Support Of POW Letter Drive

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged every union member to observe the coming holidays by appealing personally to the government of North Viet Nam for more humane treatment of U.S. servicemen held as prisoners of war.

"All Americans who believe in basic human decency are revolted at the treatment endured by American prisoners of war," Meany declared.

He cited the North Vietnamese refusal to reveal the names of its captives and its failure to keep its promise to honor the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Convention relating to basic diet and medical care and communications between prisoners and their families.

In a letter to all AFL-CIO affiliates, Meany said:

"The AFL-CIO supports the campaign of the Red Cross for mail urging the North Vietnamese, in the name of humanity, to provide the names of their prisoners, to guarantee them adequate diet and medical care, and to permit the exchange of mail between prisoners and their families.

Labor Board Upholds Guild On Strike Fines

The National Labor Relations Board has upheld the action of the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild in fining members for crossing another union's picket lines at the Washington Post and the Washington Evening Star.

The board dismissed a complaint by the two newspapers that fines of $100 to $300 levied by the Guild were unreasonable or excessive. It ruled, as it has in other union fine cases, that the reasonableness of union fines is "not within the board's purview."

Chairman Edward B. Miller and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown joined in the vote to dismiss the charge. They agreed with a trial examiner that the Guild's contracts with the two dailies did not prohibit the union from supporting the strike of another union or from fining members who cross a picket line. The board, however, rejected the examiner's finding that the Guild did not give members proper notice of possible penalties.

The board, citing recent fine cases, held that the factors relied on by the examiner raise issues that may be reviewed by a state court but do not constitute restraint or coercion under federal labor law. The board also rejected the examiner's conclusion that two Star employes were unlawfully fined because they had resigned from the union before trial but after crossing a Stereotypers' picket line between July 24 and 27, 1968.

The NLRB ruled on two previous union-fine cases last Aug. 30. In one, it held that a union may not legally fine members who resign from the union before crossing a picket line to work. In the other, it said the fairness of union fines can be determined not by the board but by state courts when a union files a suit to collect the fine.

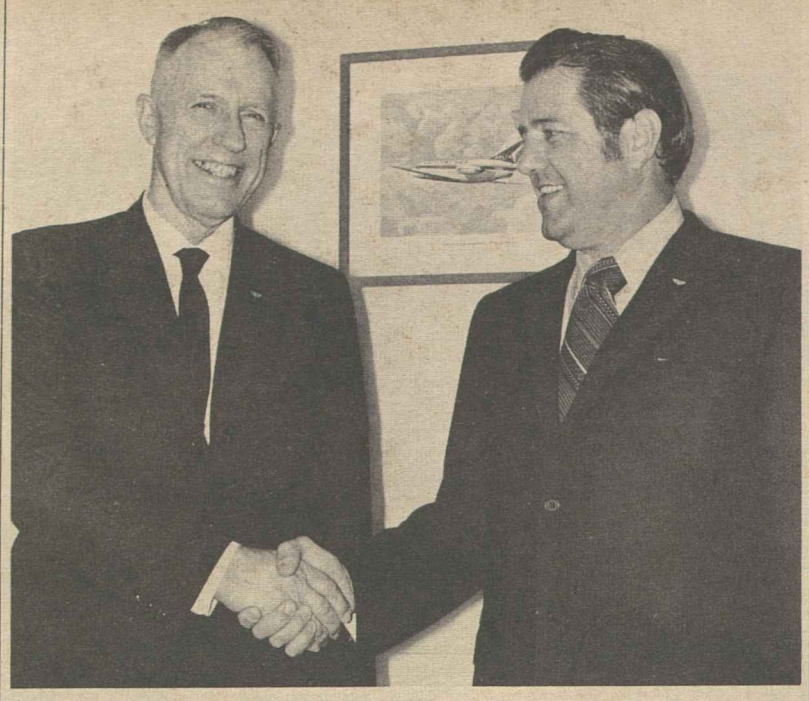
Air Line Pilots Propose Flight Security Plan

Miami Beach — The Air Line Pilots adopted a 10-point policy on security for commercial flights that includes a proposal that crew members carry firearms.

The statement approved unanimously at the ALPA's 21st biennial convention is aimed at curbing hijackings and bomb threats.

ALPA delegates called on all airports to make use of metal detection devices and to check the behavior of all passengers before they board aircraft.

The resolution also urged regulations that would give the plane's captain final authority on what action should be taken in the event of a bomb threat.



Other key points of the statement call for:

- An end to the practice of transporting prisoners and deportees by commercial airlines.
- The use of air marshals on airlines if the pilot deems it necessary.
- Protection of cockpits against forceable entry or explosives.
- Legislation to increase the penalty for carrying concealed weapons on commercial airplanes.

Harry Kelman Dies, CLC Art Director

Ottawa—Harry Kelman, production manager and art director for the Canadian Labor Congress, died of a stroke in Toronto. He was 59.

Kelman joined the CLC in 1955 after studying art and working as an artist in Paris for a number of years. He was born in Kiev, Russia, and first came to Canada at the age of 10.

Big Oil Firms Scored On Prices, Shortages

Denver—Recent price increases on gasoline and other oil products are not economically justifiable and threatened shortages of heating oil in Northeast states are not necessary, Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers charged.

Big oil corporations are trying to force the prices of crude petroleum upward and to raise gasoline prices to support the crude oil price hikes, said Grospiron.

"Plenty of crude oil is available," along with sufficient refining capacity and transportation facilities, he declared. "Any shortages which may exist are artificially created."

"We believe in protection of U.S. oil producers against excessive foreign imports," Grospiron said, "but we also believe there should be a free flow of Canadian oil into the United States, and from Western Canada to the big markets of Quebec.

"If these sources do not supply enough crude oil, our good neighbors in Venezuela are ready, willing and anxious to send us more oil. We do not need to depend at all on the insecure Middle East."

Grospiron said the industry is attempting to raise crude oil prices because "on crude the larger profits are made and the depletion allowance is granted" by the government.

There is no justification for price increases, he said, because bringing crude oil to the surface requires "a little electricity for the pumps and practically no labor."

The OCAW recently opened negotiations with 90 oil companies for renewal of contracts covering 60,000 workers. Current agreements expire Dec. 31.

"Labor costs do not justify price increases," Grospiron asserted. "Our current contract proposals, even if granted in full, would not justify" price hikes.

The volume of products turned out per hour of labor employed is increasing rapidly and has increased regularly over the years, he noted. The total labor cost of producing gasoline has not changed in 20 years—it was 2 cents a gallon then and now, he reported.

"As a union, we maintain a non-inflationary posture," the OCAW president said. "We wish the oil industry would do the same."

The union is asking wage increases of 50 cents an hour for each year of a two-year contract. The present average rate in refining is $4.25 an hour. The OCAW also is seeking health and safety clauses in every contract, uniform hospital and medical insurance with costs borne entirely by the employer, pension plan improvements, protection for workers in plant closures, and three additional paid holidays per year.

In the safety area, the union wants guarantees that healthy and safe conditions will be maintained under the direction of joint labor-management committees.

It is asking the companies to contribute one-tenth of 1 cent per barrel of oil refined into a fund for research into occupational health and safety hazards in oil and gas production. The fund would also be jointly administered with public representatives chosen by each side.

The OCAW has contracts with all major employers and many smaller ones. Only the Sun Oil contract is not up for negotiations.

Nation's Joblessness Highest in 7.5 Years

pact on the young, the blacks and the returning servicemen, further proving that "the Administration's economic game plan won't work," the federation said.

Last month's increase in unemployment from the 5.6 percent level in October, was greatest among women in the 16-24 age bracket. The jobless rate for adult men and teenagers showed little change over the month.

Overall, the number of unemployed workers increased 350,000 from October to an unadjusted level of 4.6 million, while nonfarm payroll employment declined 135,000, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Secondary effects of the General Motors strike were significant in the jobs decline, but the exact impact could not be measured, said BLS Assistant Commissioner Harold Goldstein. The strikers themselves are not counted as being unemployed.

Goldstein pointed out that employment in other sectors of the economy, especially in aerospace and defense work, also continued to decline over the month.

The unemployment rate for adult women climbed from 5.1 percent in October to 5.5 percent last month. This increase mainly reflected the rising joblessness in the 20-24 age group—up sharply from 7.5 percent to 9.5 percent.

For all adult men, the unemployment rate rose one-tenth of 1 percent to 4.2 percent. The teenage jobless rate for both sexes rose to 17.5 percent from 17.1 percent in October.

A significant rise also was shown in the jobless rate for full-time workers, increasing five-tenths of 1 percent to 5.5 percent, while the rate for part-time workers declined one-tenth of 1 percent to 8.1 percent.

The BLS also reported that the jobless rate for returning servicemen in the 20-24 age range was 9.1 percent in the third quarter of 1970 compared with 8.5 percent for non-veterans. The jobless rate for Negro veterans was 18.1 percent.

For the work force as a whole last month, white workers accounted for all the increase in joblessness. Their unemployment rate rose from 5.2 percent in October to 5.5 percent, the highest since October 1961. The jobless rate for Negroes declined from 9.3 percent to 8.8 percent in November.

In manufacturing, the unemployment rate rose to 7.2 percent from 6.7 percent in October. Unemployment in the construction industry declined from 11.9 percent to 9.1 percent last month.

Long-term unemployment climbed to the highest point since 1965, the BLS noted, with the number of workers out of a job 15 weeks or longer totaling 870,000—up 125,000 from October.

The workweek for rank-and-file employes on private nonfarm payrolls declined two-tenths of 1 hour last month to 36.8 hours.

Factory overtime also declined two-tenths of an hour to 2.5 hours, the lowest since April 1963.

Average weekly earnings, reflecting the decline in the workweek, dropped 66 cents to $121.07. Over the year ended in October, the average weekly earnings were down 2 percent when adjusted for consumer price increases.

The decline of 135,000 jobs brought nonfarm payroll employment to 70.6 million. Employment had dropped 315,000 in October.

Violations of Child Labor Law Show 15 Percent Rise in Year

Violations of federal child labor laws governing farm and nonfarm work showed a 15 percent increase over the year, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Wage-Hour Division found 1,472 children illegally employed on farms and 11,500 in nonagricultural jobs.

The Fair Labor Standards Act forbids the employment of minors under 16 on farms during school hours and at any time in farm operations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor.

More than 90 children under 16 were found employed in farm occupations deemed hazardous. Most frequently, these were operating a tractor and handling agricultural chemicals.

More young people were illegally hired to harvest vegetable crops than in any other farm work. Of 1,472 violations, wage-hour officers found 876, or 60 percent, on vegetable farms.

Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran cited the example of a shade tobacco farm employing 28 children when they should have been in school. Cheese cloth canopies covering the tobacco cut off most of the air, making the workplace hot and stuffy. Tobacco rows were too narrow and cramped for adults or males, so the farmer hired children aged 7 to 15.

Moran said more than 60 percent of illegally hired minors are under age 13, with 15 percent under 9.

Of the 11,500 nonfarm violations, the division's staff found that 7,800 under-16 children were employed during school hours or worked "excessive" hours. The other 3,700, aged 16 or 17, were reportedly working at hazardous occupations.

Some 4,400 minors under the age of 18 were found at work in violation of one or more hazardous-occupation orders. Most frequent were the 2,060 violations of Order No. 2 prohibiting minors from driving a motor vehicle while on the job.

Nearly 700 other minors were found illegally operating power-driven hoisting apparatus, Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran said.

Leading the list of industrial offenders were employers in retail trade, with 5,519 violations concentrated in eating, drinking and food establishments. Service employers including hotels, motels and laundries were accused of 1,997 violations. Manufacturing was third, with 1,748 violations concentrated in food and canning work.

Moran said the rise in violations often means that young workers are "exposed to hazards that might injure them for life" or are otherwise being exploited.

Child labor laws are intended "to encourage young people to continue their education and protect their safety," Moran asserted. A child employed during school hours is "sacrificing the education he needs to secure a decent job in the future" and a child seriously injured on the job also may lose his "ability ever to work again," he said.

The Fair Labor Standards Act requests a minimum work age of 16 years for nonagricultural jobs during school hours and an 18-year minimum for nonagricultural jobs declared by the Secretary of Labor to be hazardous.

"Employers have both a moral and legal obligation to comply with child labor laws," Moran said. "We are determined to enforce these laws."

Castor Joins Staff Of AFL-CIO News

Tom Castor, formerly a member of the State, County & Municipal Employes publications and public relations staff, has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications as an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News.

Castor, 28, a native Ohioan, was a rewriteman and reporter for the Associated Press and the Plain Dealer in Cleveland before joining the SCME staff in February 1969. He is a member of the American Newspaper Guild.

Allen Y. Zack, 26, formerly a member of the publications staff of the Transportation Institute in Washington and a rewriteman for two years on the Buffalo Evening News, has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations.

Congress Votes Ban on Rail Strike

way & Airline Clerks—the fourth union—issued a statement that "we have indicated our willingness to go into 'round-the-clock negotiations. We believe we could have an agreement in less than 24 hours which we can all live with."

Dennis ordered the 200,000 members of the Clerks back to work on a "temporary basis" after agreement by the government and the railroads to engage in "expedited bargaining."

Earlier, U.S. District Judge John H. Pratt found the Clerks in contempt of his 10-day restraining order and directed the union to end its strike by midnight, Dec. 10, or face a fine of $200,000 a day.

The emergency strike-delay legislation was passed by Congress in extraordinary night and early-morning sessions. The House passed its own version of a bill first, and the Senate approved a resolution containing an amendment added by Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The amendment, accepted in part by the House, requires the President to report to Congress 15 days prior to Mar. 1 on progress in negotiations by that time and on any Administration proposals on possible settlement terms.

House and Senate conferees deleted a third point requiring detailed plans for operation of the railroads to serve the nation's health, safety and defense needs. Instead, Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), one of the conferees, said he and Javits would write a letter to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson requesting that such a plan be prepared for the Senate.

The four unions, which represent more than two-thirds of the nation's railroad workers, repeatedly offered to exempt such traffic from any strike call and to provide crews to move such trains. Industry negotiators, headed by Chairman J. P. Hiltz of the National Railway Labor Conference, turned down a union proposal to exempt passenger service, coal for generating electricity, and defense-related operations from any shutdown.

The AFL-CIO position was stated by Federation Pres. George Meany when contract negotiations bogged down and Nixon called on Congress to bar a strike.

Meany said this would merely "saddle the railroad unions with still more delays. . . . There is no justification for forcing workers to labor against their will for the private profit of employers."

"Simple justice," Meany said, "demands that if Congress deems the railroads so vital to the economy that workers are to be denied their rights as free men, then the government should seize and operate the railroads, with the operating income going to the public treasury."

Meany declared "free collective bargaining cannot function under a system of threats and actions that can only serve to aid and abet the employers."

After Congress acted, Presidents Charles Luna of the UTU and Harold C. Crotty of the Waymen and Vice Pres. R. W. Smith of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes said in a statement that "although we remain opposed to the principle of congressional intervention in our negotiations, the action of Congress contains some bright spots."

In this instance, they said, "Congress has put the interests of the workingman on a par with those of management by granting retroactive wage increases along with the delaying proposal."

Labor's friends in Congress, they observed, "had the foresight to realize the injustice that was being done to our members by the carriers holding back a year's wage increases."

The statement added that "basically, the decks are now cleared for real negotiations with the railroads, instead of the same old delays while waiting for a bailout by Congress. . . ."

For the UTU, the Waymen and the dining car workers, the walkout started at the exact moment when they became free to take strike action upon expiration of a prior injunction. It ended four hours later.

The Clerks maintained some picket lines pending word from their officers, and other union members respected the lines in some areas.

The four unions made proposals for wage increases and other contract improvements more than a year ago. They have since engaged in negotiations, mediation, a partial strike and a Presidential Emergency Board procedure. The board recommended wage increases of 32.5 percent in seven steps over three years but tied them to a recommendation for seven changes in working rules.

Communist Bloc Again Rebuffed On Move to Expand Power in ILO

Geneva, Switzerland—A new attempt by Communist bloc nations to increase their influence in the International Labor Organization was again rebuffed at a session of the ILO's Governing Body.

The Communists failed to gain any additional seats on the ILO's key industrial committees, preventing them from winning a majority on any of the 10 committees.

The setback for the Soviet bloc was even more severe because the total number of seats on the 10 committees had been increased from 250 to 261.

Last month, Communist political attacks on the United States were squelched during the ILO maritime conference when a tirade by the Cuban delegation drew a stern rebuke from the conference president.

U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists helped lead the move to head off the Communist drive for increasing representation on the committees.

Soviet Government Delegate Ivan V. Goroshkin tried to stave off defeat in a last-minute maneuver to have the Governing Body delay final action on the committee elections until the next session. But the proposal was rejected by a vote of 31 to 8 with six abstentions.

The two recent setbacks for the Communist bloc "actually improved the posture and influence of the United States in the ILO," Faupl observed. He noted that the committee elections were of particular importance because the terms of office run for five years.

In an address to the Governing Body, U.S. Deputy Under Sec. of Labor George H. Hildebrand called on the ILO to rededicate itself to the basic task of improving the lot of workers everywhere.

Hildebrand said that the Administration would ask Congress "in due time" to restore the $3.7 million U.S. payment to the ILO. Congress had withheld the funds on the ground that the ILO was departing from its purposes and providing a forum for political attacks on the United States by Communist nations.

Hildebrand warned that the promptness of congressional action will depend "directly on the vigor with which the ILO affirms and promotes the tripartite character of its structure and the basic tasks laid down by its constitution."

Strong support came from worker, government and employer delegations for the U.S. appeal calling for an end to propaganda speeches and political attacks at the annual ILO conference.

A number of delegates also urged a halt to the Soivet-led campaign to "reform" the ILO structure by weakening the status of worker and employer delegates and increasing the influence of government delegates—thereby boosting the influence of the Communist bloc.

Canadian Joseph Morris, chief spokesman for the worker delegates, cited the need to "defend and expand the tripartite system founded on the autonomy of the worker and employer groups."

What the workers want, he declared, is to strengthen the ILO as a "still better instrument for social change and the improvement of conditions of life and work of people everywhere."

Worker delegates expressed satisfaction with the report of an ILO commission that found the Greek military government guilty of denying workers basic trade union rights.

The Greek regime assured the ILO that it has begun to act on the recommendations of the ILO commission.

The ILO worker group said that, meanwhile, "free trade unionists of the world will leave nothing undone to assist the workers in Greece in their struggle for human and trade union rights."

Rail Productivity Gains Twice National Average

American railroad workers have posted productivity increases twice as high as the national average through a period when their employers were waging a campaign to picture them as flagrant "featherbedders."

The Labor Dept. reported in a 1970 Bureau of Labor Statistics bulletin that the rate of output per man-hour of railroad work has risen steadily every year since 1939. The average increase for the period 1957-1969 was 6.4 percent a year compared with 3 percent for all U.S. workers.

Other BLS reports show that this record, unsurpassed by any other group of workers, was accomplished at a time when the number of railroad employes was in sharp decline. Class I railroads which reported 1.3 million employes in 1947 had 559,000 in September 1970—less than half.

The figures underlie the resistance of union members to new work rule changes that would lead to more layoffs, loss of at least 18,000 jobs, and immense damage to the job prospects and stability of others, their leaders report.

The United Transportation Union and the Maintenance of Way employes told newsmen in Washington that work rules changes demanded by the carriers and recommended by an Emergency Board Nov. 9, in exchange for wage increases, would affect all classes of road and yard employes.

They said the jobs of brakemen and yardmen would be hardest hit, and others affected would include conductors, clerks, yardmasters and carmen.

Leslie Cannon Dies, Led Key British Union

The AFL-CIO has sent a message of sympathy to the family of Leslie Cannon and to the 350,000 members of England's electrical and plumbing union, which Cannon had led until his death Dec. 9.

Cannon had been president of the Electrical Electronic Telecommunication Union/Plumbing Trades Union since 1963.

Federation Pres. George Meany said in his message that Cannon's death "is a heavy blow to workers of Great Britain and the entire international free trade union movement."

Court Jails Chavez, Lettuce Strike Goes On

Salinas, Calif.—Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers declared that he will stay in Monterey County Jail here until the union wins contracts from vegetable growers.

"I'm prepared to pay the price for civil disobedience," Chavez told newsmen as he was led to jail Dec. 5 for refusing to call off a strike against lettuce, celery and artichoke growers in California, Texas, Arizona and Colorado.

State Superior Court Judge Gordon Campbell found Chavez guilty of contempt of court for refusing to abandon his union's strike and boycott. Acting on complaint of Bud Antle Farms, Inc., Salinas, the court levied fines of $500 on each of two counts and sentenced Chavez to serve 10 days in the county jail, with future jailing implicit unless the strike is called off.

In a statement issued in Washington, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared "injunctions and jail sentences will not solve labor disputes. They never have." He noted that UFWOC is appealing the judge's action "and we look for justice from a higher court."

Lawyers for Antle and other growers charged their clients have a valid contract with the Teamsters and will not drop it. Therefore the Farm Workers have been picketing illegally and conducting a forbidden secondary boycott, they told the court.

National Teamster leaders, however, assured Meany they will leave jurisdiction of field workers to the farm union headed by Chavez.

Some 3,000 union members held a candlelight mass outside the jail here, and were joined by Ethel Kennedy, widow of Robert F. Kennedy. They plan to maintain a 'round-the-clock vigil and to intensify their campaign for union contracts, they said.

The Burns Formula

IT'S BEEN a good many years since a major public figure has attacked collective bargaining, the minimum wage law and prevailing wage statutes in one fell swoop but the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has managed it.

Dr. Arthur F. Burns, during his years in the Eisenhower Administration as chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers and as a personal adviser to then Vice Pres. Nixon, was considered a "moderate" influence during the 1950s.

There were three recessions in those years brought on in part by the economic policies advocated by Dr. Burns. But in contrast to some of the other economic advisers of that period, he was thought to be more reasonable and responsive.

With the election of Pres. Nixon in 1968, Dr. Burns became a major White House adviser on economic policy and was identified with the economic strategy of the Administration: the "game plan."

In January 1970, the President rewarded Dr. Burns with one of the major economic policy posts in the nation—the chairmanship of the Federal Reserve Board, a role in which he would have a critical impact on monetary policy and therefore the state of the country's economic health.

As head of the Federal Reserve Board, Burns could operate with a greater degree of independence, although his ties to the President and the White House, developed over a long period of time, were stronger than ever.

This allowed him to have it both ways. The President, in a speech to the National Association of Manufacturers, indicated some faltering steps toward acting to reverse the recession-oriented economy—while maintaining the Administration's basic posture that wage increases are at the root of all economic ills. Burns, in a speech at Pepperdine College in Los Angeles, indicated he would go along with the President in terms of FRB policy but then let fly with a list of suggestions on how really to get the country back into good economic shape.

THE BURNS FORMULA has in its favor a forthrightness and candor that is sometimes missing from White House economic policy statements. The FRB chairman would take care of union bargaining strength by imposing compulsory arbitration—an old standby of the reactionaries to weaken and gut the free labor movement.

He would sap the basic foundations of the minimum wage floor by allowing employers to hire young workers at a lower rate than their older brothers or sisters would draw. And as for a long-standing federal law that says the government should pay prevailing area wage rates on construction projects using government funds, Dr. Burns would suspend it.

It all adds up to a formula of undermining, weakening and eventually destroying basic living standards for American workers in the name of economic stability or fighting inflation. There has been a general impression that such policies, seriously advanced by a major government official, belonged to another era of repression and reaction. But Dr. Burns has dusted off and repackaged them for a new assault on American workers.

'It's Me, All Right'

A Word Edgewise:

Hickel's Firing Strikes Blow For Candor in Bureaucracy

By John P. Roche

THE NEWS that President Nixon actually fired Secretary of the Interior Walter J. Hickel set off shock tremors in Washington, tremors that registered on seismographs as far away as Samoa. To understand why, it is important to fill in a little background. A hasty review of presidential history since Franklin D. Roosevelt assumed office in 1933 indicates that the only other Chief Executive who summarily bounced a Cabinet member was Harry S Truman. Yet it is quite clear that a number of Cabinet secretaries over the years have richly deserved the boot for incompetence, disloyalty, or both.

The reason for this inertia is simple: a president has a vested interest in his mistakes, and the bigger they are, the greater his involvement. Thus for a president to dismiss a high official is a confession of error, an open admission that the initial appointment was a mistake.

On the other side of the hill, a Cabinet member who opposes Administration policy can generally be counted on to rise above principle. There were high officials of the Johnson Administration who constantly attacked the President's foreign policy at Georgetown dinner parties, but it would have taken a bulldozer to get them out of their executive suites.

In fact, by a queer twist, opposition to the war in Viet Nam became a protection racket. An incompetent, feeling presidential pressure and suspecting that the White House was getting set to lower the boom, would suddenly undergo a miraculous transformation from hawk to dove. Then, of course, he couldn't be fired. Why? Because his dismissal would prove there was no room in the Johnson Administration for "dissent." The President once remarked wryly that "Califano (who kept a close and flinty eye on the bureaucracy in his role as Special Assistant for Domestic Programs) created more doves than the Tet offensive."

THE LONG and short of it is that when problems arise between presidents and top bureaucrats, things are fudged over and some form of polite disengagement is worked out. Franklin D. Roosevelt, for example, simply went right around Secretary of State Cordell Hull and did direct business with Undersecretary Sumner Welles. Hull complained and complained, but apparently he needed the job and never did fulfill his recurring threat of resignation.

Or, there is the "you go quietly and we'll fix you up" scenario. Here a high official writes the president a warm letter explaining that his health is failing and that—despite the fact that he has never known a greater or wiser leader—he must depart. The president replies with an equivalent application of superlatives. This has to be carefully managed: in one situation of this sort, the president's gushing acceptance of a resignation allegedly went out before the letter of resignation arrived. The character involved, holding an overpowering testimonial to his devotion, skill, and loyalty, promptly raised the ante!

The really tricky cases are those of men whom the president can't trust, but can't fire: they know where the bodies are buried. For them every Administration has established a welfare program; they are tucked away in sinecures doing very little for extremely high compensation. (Every bureaucracy, public or private, has a similar apparatus.) If the president is fortunate, they will engage in harmless activities; if he is unlucky, they will spend their time and his money preparing "inside revelations."

Against this canvas, then, you can understand why Hickel's dismissal hit Washington like an earthquake. Pres. Nixon is to be commended. Perhaps his candor will lead to a revival in the bureaucracy of the ancient, honorable, and virtually forgotten practice of resigning on principle.

Target of Word Blitz:

American Workers Struggling With New Style Class Warfare

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at the Fourth Annual Cardinal Cushing Dinner in Boston, Mass., Nov. 21, 1970.

WE LIVE in the most revolutionary society in the world. The pace of technological, social and cultural change is more rapid here than anywhere else—and that pace is accelerating. We confront problems which no one else has ever faced before, and which other societies will not face for decades or generations to come. The answers will come, not from blueprints, but from living and grappling with the problems first hand.

To an extent not commonly supposed, answers to the problems of work come from below. They emerge from the varied experiences and insights of working people themselves, as each one seeks to develop and perfect himself through his daily work.

Yet, fewer and fewer of the apostles of words and ideas really know very much about working people today. They should begin to learn before they prescribe.

First, they ought to know what the worker is not.

He is not a cartoon. He is not a reactionary, and he is not a revolutionary. He is not a hard hat, but neither is he a head full of mush. He is nobody's fool and he isn't looking to be anybody's hero.

He didn't start the war in Viet Nam, although he has a better chance of losing his son there. He didn't create the military-industrial complex, although he is accused of depending on it for his job. He didn't make more than $8,000 last year, although his latest wage increase is said to cause inflation. He wasn't responsible for slavery, he didn't prosper from segregation and he is not a racist although he may now be told to put his job on the altar of society's atonement.

Then they should discover who the worker is.

He is the man who is living and grappling with the problems. He is at the center of the most profound and far-reaching changes in our society. Not because he is an activist or a social innovator, but because he is on the line, at the point of production, where the heat is. He is bound to a technology that refuses to stand still long enough to allow human beings to adjust to it—and he has no cushion or surplus to shield him from constant instability. He is caught up in all the social, cultural and political consequences of the dynamism of our times.

So, not only must the worker struggle to make ends meet—no easy thing in this era of the New Hooverism—but he must also struggle to sustain a sense of who he is, a sense of his economic function and social identity, in a society where occupational obsolescence rivals the Detroit variety and where work patterns are about as stable as an ice cube on a radiator. This is, you might say, a continuing struggle against marginality and uselessness. You might even call it a struggle for relevance.

AS IF HE didn't have enough problems, the American worker has lately had to fend off a propaganda blitz aimed at blaming him for everything from Viet Nam to racism. This is a new form of class warfare, but with a curious twist. Twenty years ago, when you tried to organize a union in your plant, the boss denounced you as a Red. Now he and his friends at the country club denounce you as a reactionary pillar of the status quo. And so it has come to pass, in this Alice-in-Wonderland world, that the well-to-do elite accuse those who have little of being the mainstay of "the system," while they, who have benefitted most from the system pander to its enemies. This is an old gambit—self-protection by the creation of a diversionary target.

Such nonsense does not stem exclusively from the chic Left. Witness, for example, the recent suggestion of an Administration spokesman that workers could hasten the reduction of unemployment by moderating their wage demands. In other words, the unemployed worker should not blame the Administration for his plight; he should blame his fellow workers for their greed at the bargaining table. It's the old story: Pit the have-nots against the have-littles, while the have-lots keep getting more.

To those who are now trying to find, dissect and classify the American worker, I offer this advice. Do not look for his identification marks in his hair length, life styles, manner or dress. Look instead for work. Look at the nature of the productive process, of the work performed. Then look at the people engaged in it. Learn something of the problems and struggles which that engagement generates. Then you will have your definition of the American worker. He is what he does. He is what he struggles to do.

Unemployment, Inflation Increase:

Workers Pay 'Terrible Price' For Nixon Economic Policies

WORKERS HAVE PAID a "terrible price" for the Administration's attempts to cool inflation, and those attempts have been "one big flop," the AFL-CIO charged on network radio.

Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger called for "decisive and massive stimulus" to pull the national economy out of the stagnation that has caused sales and production to shrink while unemployment and inflation accelerate.

He said that full funding of federal housing, community facilities, anti-pollution and health-care programs should be first steps.

Goldfinger warned that unless the Administration changes its economic "game plan," the unemployment rate may go to 6.5 percent next year, with 5.5 million workers unable to find jobs. He made the statements as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

While the badly-needed stimulus to the economy might boost the federal deficit to some extent, Goldfinger said, it would also put more people to work, increase income, and thereby boost federal tax receipts. He said "we've already stumbled into the present budget deficit, and we're stumbling and fumbling into a bigger deficit" with the Administration's "game plan" that has clamped a "severe squeeze on the economy."

The labor economist said there is no need to couple increased federal spending with a tax increase. "With so much slack in the economy, [that] would merely pull money out," while what is needed is "more money in the economy," he asserted.

Goldfinger said he's sure that "serious policy debates" leading to a change of economic policy are now going on within the Administration. "The message must have gotten across, even to them, that their 'game plan' has failed," he added. He noted that Pres. Nixon also "faces a political problem" and is "very concerned" about what level unemployment might reach in 1972, a presidential election year.

Reporters questioning Goldfinger were Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post and Donald Finley of United Press International.

Meany Joins Appeal For Pakistan Relief

Additional assistance for the victims of the hurricane that devastated the shores and coastal islands of East Pakistan is being pressed by the Pakistan Relief Committee.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has agreed to serve as a member of the committee headed by former U.S. Ambassador Robert D. Murphy.

Only partial relief has resulted for the victims through efforts of other countries and private organizations like the Red Cross and CARE, Meany said.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE SENATE failed by a mere three votes to secure the necessary two-thirds margin to override Pres. Nixon's veto of a bill to place reasonable limits on political campaign spending on radio and television, it established a major issue for the 92nd Congress.

The President, in his veto message last October, gave a number of reasons for his action but the primary one was that it placed controls on only one phase of campaign spending.

What was most disconcerting was that the President did not indicate that he would receive all-inclusive controls with favor. In fact, as Washington Window noted at the time, the White House obviously had no plans to propose such legislation.

In the lame-duck session, when the Senate got down to the business of seeking to override the veto, the White House had retreated. It was the only way the veto could be sustained.

The President, in effect, made a pledge to Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, commending him for proposing a "comprehensive campaign reform bill for the 92nd Congress."

NIXON SAID that "the Administration, of course, will work closely with you, other members of the Congress, and the governors in an effort to arrive at a bill which will deal with all problems of political campaigns, including spending limitations, in a direct, effective and enforceable manner.

The remarkable thing about the debate prior to the vote on the veto was that all members of the Senate who spoke, and there were more than a score, decried soaring campaign costs, regardless of their position on the veto.

Opponents of the veto made some telling points:

● Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) declared that "when one examines the spiraling costs of campaigning for elective office and the rapidly accelerating costs of the electronic media for this purpose, then the objective is a major one by any standard."

● Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) was even more blunt: "The President criticizes the bill because it plugs 'only one hole in a sieve,' but the metaphor is false, because broadcast spending is both the largest and newest hole in the sieve.

"On the logic of the veto, the President might as well abandon his welfare reform plan, if he cannot get it all. Or, he might reject the auto pollution restraints on Detroit now pending in the Senate-House conference, on the ground that we are failing to cover all polluters."

The point made by both senators, that the electronic media is the largest as well as the newest campaign spending outlet, is borne out by studies covering three recent presidential elections by Citizens Research Foundation of Princeton, N.J. They show:

The figures on the 1970 election are far from conclusive. One knowledgeable authority estimates that as much as $35 million may have been spent on television in the senatorial and gubernatorial races alone.

Our entire political system may become the property of the very rich if action is not taken in the 92nd Congress.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S attempts to cool inflation have been "one big flop," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger charges on Labor News Conference. Goldfinger, center, is questioned by Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post and Donald Finley of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Auto Workers Put Ford Pact To Members

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached a new contract agreement with the Ford Motor Co. for 166,000 employes in the United States and submitted it to a membership vote to be completed Dec. 15.

Patterned on the union's recent settlement with General Motors Co., the three-year pact has been approved by the UAW negotiating committee and the UAW Ford Council with a recommendation that members ratify its terms.

The GM settlement was reached in mid-November after a 10-week strike. Still unsettled is the strike of 25,000 GM workers in Canada, which started in September. Still to be settled also are UAW contracts with Chrysler and American Motors, and Ford of Canada. None of the latter three was struck while the union concentrated on GM.

A feature of the Ford settlement is a retroactive date of Sept. 15, when the old contract expired, for wage increases of 26 cents an hour due in "overage" from the former contract's cost-of-living escalator clause. Another 25 cents of the average first-year increase of 51 cents is retroactive to Nov. 2.

The Ford contract, like the one at GM, also provides additional wage increases of 3 percent in the second and third contract year, an unlimited cost-of-living escalator, retirement at any age after 30 years of service with a monthly pension benefit of $500, to take effect next Oct. 1, and other gains.

A new benefit is Ford's recognition of the principle of prepaid dental care, the union said. Ford agreed to deduct from pay any premium contributions approved by employes for family dental care programs, to be set up by unions at the local level.

PUERTO RICO Regional Dir. Manuel Menendez of the Clothing Workers, third from left, receives a $10,000 check from Louis Hollander, co-manager of the Clothing Workers' New York Joint Board which raised the money for victims of the October floods in Puerto Rico. # Role of Group Practice In Health Plan Stressed

Philadelphia—Prepaid group practice medical plans will be the backbone of the proposed National Health Insurance, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman told a conference here on the crisis in health care.

The one-day session was sponsored by the Philadelphia AFL-CIO which currently is working to establish a proposed prepaid group practice plan in the city.

"It will mean better medical care for thousands of men, women and children," Seidman said as he congratulated the Philadelphia council on its support of the group plan.

"In communities throughout the country, where prepaid group plans are in operation or getting underway, it provides a practical alternative to outmoded solo-practice, fee-for-service, low-quality, high-cost medical care."

In his keynote address to the conference of 250 labor and political leaders, medical men and representatives of private health insurance companies, Seidman said there is no longer a question of whether the country will have National Health Insurance.

He said it is only a matter of deciding what its major features will be and when it will be enacted.

Seidman recited facts the AFL-CIO has stressed repeatedly to point up the sad state of health care in America. There are, he noted:

- Thirty-five other nations where 10-year-old boys can expect to live longer.
- Ten other nations where 10-year-old girls have a greater life expectancy.
- Thirteen other nations were new-born babies have a better chance of survival.

"And as poor as this record is for white, middle-class America," he said, "it is far worse for those who are not white, who live in poverty and city ghettos and rural shacks.

"These Americans can expect seven fewer years of life than average. Their infant mortality rate is about even with that of Ecuador."

Appalachian Labor Unit Gets Job-Training Grant

Charleston, W. Va.—The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council signed a $2.45 million contract with the Labor Dept. for on-the-job training programs for 2,300 jobless or underemployed residents of 11 states.

The council is authorized under the grant to subcontract with employers for on-job training programs, classroom instruction and skill upgrading.

Employers will pay wages and benefits under existing collective bargaining agreements "whenever applicable," Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson said. In no case will trainees be paid less than minimum wage rates or prevailing wage rates, whichever is higher, plus fringe benefits.

The 18-month contract was funded under the Manpower Development & Training Act. Average cost per trainee is estimated at $1,065.

Under the program, 130 trainees will be enrolled in Alabama at a cost allocation of $123,000, 65 in Georgia for $104,000, 130 in Kentucky for $159,000, 130 in Maryland for $178,000, 130 in North Carolina for $171,000, 260 in Ohio for $313,000, 565 in Pennsylvania for $638,000, 65 in South Carlina for $78,000, 130 in Tennessee at $131,000, 130 in Virginia at $123,000 and 565 in West Virginia at a cost of $431,000.

Hodgson said nearly $1.6 million in federal funds was earmarked for on-the-job training costs and $250,000 for trainee allowances under the supervision of the Manpower Administration; and $612,000 for supplemental instruction costs under the supervision of the U.S. Office of Education.

On-the-job training periods will range from 4 to 26 weeks or an average of 15 weeks. Classroom instruction for 500 trainees will include basic education and prevocational training for six to 16 weeks.

Both on-the-job training and classroom work will be available for a total of 500 pupils. Some trainees, who will be selected by employers from their own workforce, will be given skill upgrading instruction.

During the job phase of the program, trainees will be instructed in work habits, communication skills, personal hygiene and standards of behavior and performance.

Nearly half the trainees will be new hires, with at least 65 percent recruited from the disadvantaged jobless, the Labor Dept. said. State Employment Service offices will refer, test and counsel applicants for trainee positions, administer payment of trainee allowances, and provide job placement help upon completion of the program.

Officers of the Appalachian Council are Pres. Miles C. Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, chairman; Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, vice chairman; and Pres. Charles A. Della of the Maryland AFL-CIO, secretary-treasurer. Presidents of state central bodies in the other eight council states are members of the board of directors.

Workers Buy Two-Thirds of Savings Bonds

Worker participation accounts for more than two-thirds of the projected $5 billion in 1970 sales of U.S. Savings Bonds, according to a report on the Savings Bond program.

The report, submitted to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by the Treasury Dept., indicated that those on the Payroll Savings Plan—mostly union members — buy 11 million bonds a month. This represents monthly savings of more than $322 million.

Meany said the report was "a tribute to the historic patriotism of union members everywhere. But we also should view the facts and figures as a spur to greater participation of union members as payroll savers."

The total cash value of all Series E Bonds has been raised to the highest level in their history—more than $45 billion, the report said.

Bipartisan Compromise:

Congress Passes Public Jobs Plan

tals to hire unemployed workers with the federal government paying 80 percent of the payroll cost.

With virtually every local government pressed for funds and a number of cities forced to lay off workers and cut back services, the legislation was termed crucial by mayors attending the National League of Cities convention in Atlanta. The league's executive director, John Gunther, was dispatched to Washington to urge top Administration officials to go along with the bill.

A somewhat complex formula provides two sources of funds for the public service jobs program.

First, the program is guaranteed a share of the overall multi-billion dollar manpower budget.

The legislation authorizes basic appropriations of $2 billion for the 1972 fiscal year, which starts next July 1, $2.5 billion for the following year and $3 billion for 1974.

Of whatever amount is actually appropriated, approximately one-third is earmarked for public service jobs. A portion of this can be shifted by the Secretary of Labor to other programs, but the irreducible minimum amounts to 25 percent of the total appropriation.

In addition, a separate appropriation only for public service jobs is authorized, starting with $200 million for the balance of the current fiscal year, moving up to $400 million in fiscal 1972, $600 million the following year, and $800 million in fiscal 1974.

Congress would have to appropriate the funds year by year; the authorization merely sets a ceiling on the amount that can be appropriated.

The legislation would decentralize control of most manpower programs from the federal government to the states and larger cities. However, these "prime sponsors" would have to come up with acceptable overall plans for allocation of funds before the Labor Dept. would release the money.

Labor for some years had pressed for federally-financed public service jobs to take up the slack in the private economy and to provide needed services that cities have been unable to afford.

As the unemployment rate continued to mount, congressional support built up until the key issue became how extensive a program should be mounted and whether the jobs were to be considered permanent slots or merely another form of training.

Initially the House-Senate conferees had agreed on a higher appropriations ceiling, close to the Senate-passed bill. But then, in an effort to hold support in the House and lessen the threat of a presidential veto, they reconvened and cut $2.5 billion from the four-year spending ceiling.

House Republican conferees refused, however, to be won over by the new compromise. Rep. William A. Steiger (R-Wis.) told newsmen the measure remained "unacceptable."

Unions Help Modernize Industrial Arts Courses

Industrial arts courses in junior high schools are being restructured with the cooperation of trade unions to give students a more practical preparation for the world of work.

The revolutionary teaching method developed at Ohio State University offers a broader scope of the know-how needed in construction and manufacturing.

In contrast to the traditional courses in simple mechanical drawing and the use of a few hand tools to make bookends or dust pans, the youngsters are introduced to fundamental concepts and principles of production, management and union organization.

The Industrial Arts Curriculum Project was launched in 1965 with a grant from the U.S. Office of Education. Additional funds also are coming from several AFL-CIO unions and business organizations.

But for the first time, craft union representatives have been called in to become directly involved with the development of the program and in the writing of the textbooks used in the courses.

Assistance came from members of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades and Industrial Union Departments in producing teacher guides, laboratory manuals, teaching aids and other equipment used in the courses.

The first year course, "The World of Construction," deals closely with the on-site situations in the building industry that involve both management and labor.

The second year course, "The World of Manufacturing," in which the IUD is currently lending its assistance in counselling and reviewing of revised textbooks, explores the in-plant operations of the manager-worker production system.

Thus far, 53 schools in 34 cities across the country have adopted the new courses, Ohio State University reports. Representatives from building trades councils and industrial unions also have cooperated in helping establish the courses at the local levels.

The courses are not designed to develop job-entry skills in the various crafts, but are considered essential liberal education programs.

Typical classes in the construction course are related closely to actual work situations. Among the positions assigned to the students are foreman, timekeeper, equipment supervisor and safety and grievance man.

Besides the technical matters covered in the course, the textbooks also explore labor-management activities in collective bargaining, working conditions, handling of grievances and mediation and arbitration.

Although more than 15,000 students in nine states have completed the program, much of the emphasis is still on the training of teachers to extend the programs to other areas.

New IBEW Film Views U.S. Society

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has produced a half-hour, color movie dealing with the problem of communications and understanding among diverse segments of American society.

Entitled, "Where To?" the movie is set among the monuments, parks, government buildings and ghettos of Metropolitan Washington, D.C.

The film will be loaned free of charge to any group making application to the IBEW, 1200 Fifteenth St., N. W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

House Battle Slated On Food Stamp Bill

Minn.) and Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) "a substantial improvement" that would make the food stamp program more effective "in combatting hunger and malnutrition in America."

The AFL-CIO "enthusiastically endorses it," Biemiller said.

The letter also expressed labor's strong opposition to any amendment that would deny food stamps to striking workers and their families, regardless of their need.

Whatever action the House takes, a final version would have to be worked out by a House-Senate conference committee and approved by both bodies before adjournment.

Under the food stamp program, launched as a pilot project by Pres. Kennedy and enacted into law in 1964, low-income individuals and families purchase food stamps at a discount and use them at face value to buy food products of their choice at retail stores. The lower their income, the less they have to pay for the stamps.

Both the Senate bill and the Quie-Foley substitute would authorize free food stamps for families with very little cash income —under $60 a month in the Senate bill and $30 in the House substitute.

As contrasted with the leave-it-to-the-states policy of the House Agriculture Committee bill, the Quie-Foley substitute would permit the Secretary of Agriculture to initiate a food stamp program in any state that does not have one 300 days after the law is passed.

He would also set national eligibility standards, but there would be a congressional guarantee that, as a minimum, a family of four with not more than $4,000 annual income would be covered.

The labor-sponsored substitute would also raise the ceiling on appropriations from the current maximum of $610 million to $2 billion for the current fiscal year, rising to $2.5 billion the second year, and then to $3 billion.

In another area, an end-of-the-session drive opened to bring to the House floor a bill to strengthen the enforcement powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The Senate has acted on a bill, but the House Rules Committee has bottled up an AFL-CIO supported measure cleared by the House Labor Committee.

Civil rights groups have sought to have the bill brought to the House floor under the rarely-successful discharge petition procedure, which required the signatures of a majority of the entire House.

Biemiller has written House members urging them to sign the discharge petition so that the bill can be acted on before adjournment.

As Congress moved into its last full week, the Senate Finance Committee put the finishing touches on a massive "conglomerate" bill.

Its base is a House-passed 5 percent increase in social security benefits—which the Senate committee doubled to 10 percent, with a new minimum benefit of $100 a month.

Added to it, almost as an afterthought, was a brand new "catastrophic illness" insurance program covering virtually everyone under the Medicare age of 65.

It would provide for wage earners covered by social security and their immediate families 80 percent of medical expenses over $2,000 in a single year and hospital care starting after the first 60 days of hospitalization. The cost estimate the committee came up with was $2.2 billion a year.

Because the committee never held hearings on the plan and neither the House nor its Ways & Means Committee considered it, there appears to be only a slim possibility that it will stay in any legislation finally enacted this year.

Attached to the bill also is the Senate committee's version of the House-passed trade bill — an improvement over the House version in the AFL-CIO's view.

And the catch-all bill also includes an experimental limited test of the Administration's family assistance, welfare reform program.

The Senate is expected to take up the Finance Committee package Dec. 15 and congressional leaders are aiming at a Dec. 18 adjournment date.

A number of major bills are in House-Senate conference committees, including the different versions of the occupational safety and health bill.

A little-noticed bill that would make government employe salary increases automatic without congressional action has been agreed to by House and Senate conferees and appeared headed for passage.

Annual pay increases would be based on surveys of comparable salaries in private industry under a procedure involving participation by federal employe unions.

R. E. Kennedy Confirmed as NLRB Member

Ralph E. Kennedy, regional director for the National Labor Relations Board since 1958 and for 10 years before that an NLRB field attorney, will take the oath of office Dec. 14 as a member of the five-man labor board.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson will swear in Kennedy for the five-year term to which Pres. Nixon appointed him. The Senate voted confirmation of Kennedy's appointment by voice vote to the post vacated Aug. 27 by Frank W. McCulloch.

Kennedy, 50, was born in Springfield, Mo. He is a 1942 graduate of the Southwest Missouri State College and a 1944 graduate of the Washington University School of Law, St. Louis.

He joined the NLRB legal staff in 1948 and was named regional attorney for the Los Angeles region 10 years later.

A Republican, his appointment gives the board a majority of that party. The others are Chairman Edward B. Miller and Howard Jenkins, Jr.

RALPH E. KENNEDY

MORE THAN 3,000 members of the AFL-CIO unions in the Hollywood Film Council jammed the Hollywood Palladium for a rally in support of the council's fight to stem the exportation of U.S. film-making jobs. Unemployment in the American film industry reached 40 percent this year.

27-Union Rally Fights Export Of Film Jobs

Hollywood—Top California political leaders and officials of the AFL-CIO have pledged their support to the Hollywood Film Council's fight against the exportation of U.S. film-making jobs.

Both Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan and Democratic Sen.-elect John V. Tunney vowed to do all in their power to bring film production back to its Hollywood home—in a year that saw 70 percent of all movies shown in the nation made abroad.

With unemployment in the film industry reaching 40 percent this year, Reagan and Tunney agreed that a 20 percent gross-revenue, tax-reduction subsidy to the industry was fair.

They spoke during a rally at the Hollywood Palladium attended by more than 3,000 members of the 27 AFL-CIO unions composing the Hollywood Film Council.

Other pledges of support came from Representatives John H. Dent (D-Pa.) and Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.).

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter to participants in the rally that "the Hollywood Film Council has the complete support of the AFL-CIO in its fight against runaway films.

"Motion picture and television producers are exporting the jobs of American workers," Meany said. "Even commercials advertising American products are being filmed abroad and shown in the United States to American workers, many of them out of work and unable to buy the advertised product."

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, reminded the rally that Hollywood is feeling the same economic pinch as the rest of the state, which has 500,000 jobless.

"But," he added, "if the federal government can give billions to the agricultural industry, including millions to California growers for not growing crops, surely it could give subsidies to this stricken industry."

House Revives Hopes To Extend SST Funds

A decisive 213-174 vote in the House revived hopes that Congress will continue funds to develop a supersonic transport plane despite a Senate vote to kill the project.

A House-Senate conference committee is expected to trim the appropriation back from the $290 million voted by the House last May. But even a reduced funding bill is likely to face a sharp challenge in the Senate, which voted 52-41 to delete all money for the program from the Dept. of Transportation appropriations bill.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had endorsed the SST funding, warning that the nation's economy would suffer a staggering blow and unemployment would soar if the American aerospace industry lost its dominant place in the world aviation market. The council stressed that development of the SST is being accompanied by continued research on environmental pollution—the chief concern of opponents of faster-than-sound commercial aircraft.

In both the Senate and House, the vote on the issue split party lines and normal liberal-conservative divisions.

The Senate vote was a stunning switch from just a year ago, when a similar move to kill SST funding was beaten on a 58-22 vote.

This time around, 34 Democrats and 18 Republicans supported the motion by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) to delete the funds. Opposing the cancellation were 20 Democrats and 21 Republicans.

Pres. Nixon joined in appealing to the House to preserve the program. With the aerospace industry already hurt by "substantial unemployment," the President noted, cancellation of the project would cost "at least 150,000 jobs" and would represent a waste of nearly $700 million already spent.

"The SST is an airplane that will be built and flown," Nixon said. "This issue is simply which nation will build them."

Both a British-French combine and the Soviet Union are already flight-testing SST prototypes.

The House test came during the normally routine procedure of appointing conferees to meet with Senate representatives on the bill.

Rep. Sidney R. Yates (D-Ill.) moved to instruct the conferees to agree to the Senate amendment killing funds for the program.

But the House voted to table his motion—in effect defeating it and telling the conferees to insist on an SST appropriation.

Voting to keep the SST program alive were 108 Democrats and 105 Republicans; opposed were 112 Democrats and 62 Republicans.

Footwear Jobs Lost to Imports, 3,300 Get Aid

More than 3,300 workers in three states who lost their jobs or became underemployed as a result of rising imports of rubber footwear, have been certified as eligible for benefits under the Trade Adjustment Act.

The Act provides for cash readjustment allowances, testing, counseling, training and job placement and relocation, if needed and desired.

Involved are employes of the Servus Rubber Co., Rock Island, Ill.; Uniroyal, Inc., at Mishawaka, Ind., and the B. F. Goodrich Footwear Co., Watertown, Mass.

Petitions requesting eligibility were filed by United Rubber Workers Locals 65 and 215 on behalf of 900 workers at the Mishawaka plant and 430 at the Rock Island installation. AFL-CIO Federal Local Union 21914 filed on behalf of approximately 2,000 Watertown workers.

Eligibility certifications affect those workers who became unemployed or underemployed after Dec. 19, 1968, at Watertown; after April 21, 1968, Mishawaka and between Sept. 1, 1967, and Dec. 1, 1969, at the Rock Island plant.

For certified workers' payments up to $85 a week are allowed for 52 weeks, but an extension of 26 weeks is permitted to enable workers to complete approved training courses. An additional 13 weeks payments is also allowed for workers over 60 who lost their jobs.

'Bold Action' Urged To Spur Economy

get deficit and an increase in the money supply.

The change in direction is "welcome," Meany commented, "but faltering steps are not enough."

Calling for bolder action, Meany declared:

"Mini-expansion will not put millions of jobless back to work. Unless unemployment is sharply and promptly reversed, it will feed on itself and joblessness will continue to roll up to even higher levels."

Even Nixon's "mini-expansion" prompted an implied rebuke from Burns, who as head of the federal reserve system has independent economic power.

Nixon told the NAM he has been "assured" by Burns that the federal reserve banks would step up the supply of money and credit needed to finance an expanding economy.

"I am confident that this commitment will be kept," the President said.

But Burns, just three days later, stressed that "we must be careful to avoid excessive monetary expansion" and strongly implied that the nation's central banking system will keep a tight grip on the purse strings until wage increases are curbed.

Both Nixon and Burns, however, agreed on heaping blame on the construction trades.

Nixon told the NAM that "when construction wage settlements are more than double the national average for all manufacturing at a time when many construction workers are out of work, then something is basically wrong with that industry's bargaining process."

The President called for replacement of "craft-by-craft, city-by-city" bargaining with area or regional bargaining machinery.

He said he has asked the tripartite Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission "to take the initiative in working out these changes with leaders of management and labor. If the commission determines that legislation is required," Nixon said, "it will be proposed."

The attack by Burns on the nearly 40-year-old Davis-Bacon Act came as Administration officials were openly exploring means of getting around the prevailing wage law.

Meany protested the President's "one-sided criticism" of the building trades. "The cost of labor is only one of many components in the cost of a building," Meany noted.

"The fact is that the on-site cost of labor as a percentage of the cost of a house has gone down in the past two decades, at the very time that the cost of land and the cost of money—two major components—have gone up sharply.

"The President ignored these two factors completely in his attempt to blame union wage increases for the entire problem," Meany charged.

Growing lines of jobless throughout the nation have pushed the economic debate from the financial sections of newspapers to front page headlines.

Terms like monetary expansion and deficit spending—once the private jargon of economists—have become political gut issues.

The AFL-CIO program, spelled out by Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger in a recent speech to a business group, calls frankly for a large temporary budget deficit to lift the economy out of the doldrums and an increase of the money supply to finance the needed expansion at reasonable interest rates.

The trade union movement's thesis is that full use of the nation's industrial capacity would lower unit labor costs. And this combined with lower interest rates would reduce costs and prices all along the line.

Meany's comment on the Nixon speech stressed the point that "this is the time for bold action, and the President must face up to that fact."

Labor Board Sets Standard For Colleges

The National Labor Relations Board has agreed to take jurisdiction over labor relations cases involving any private non-profit college or university which has a gross annual revenue of $1 million or more for operating expenses. That means nonprofessional employes of such colleges are entitled to the protection of the federal labor law.

The rule, effective immediately, was announced through publication Dec. 3 in the Federal Register. It was the NLRB's second step in asserting its jurisdiction over private non-profit educational institutions. The first step was taken last June 12 when the board, on petition by the AFL-CIO and some of its affiliated unions, acted on a Cornell University election petition and agreed to set money standards for accepting future cases.

The Service Employes had urged the board to set a $100,000 annual gross revenue standard. The union reported that in the fall of 1968 there were 1,472 private colleges, universities and junior colleges with 390,000 full-time and 209,000 part-time employes in the United States.

In establishing the new $1 million standard, the board decided to exclude from gross annual revenue any contributions to colleges that cannot be used for operating expenses because of limitations by the donor.

The board estimated its new rule will bring 80 percent of all private non-profit schools and about 95 percent of their non-professional employes within the reach of the labor law. Publicly-operated schools are excluded from the law's coverage.

CITATION to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is presented at the 10th annual Oblate College convocation honoring outstanding members of the Catholic laity. The Very Rev. Thomas J. Reddy, center, provincial of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, and the Very Rev. Richard J. Murphy, college president, also gave Meany an honorary Doctor of Humane Letters degree.

Meany Affirms Faith In Future of America

Concerned Americans, with the church and labor as solid bulwarks, can work together to help the nation solve its pressing problems, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told students and alumni of Oblate College at a special convocation held in his honor.

The Very Rev. Thomas J. Reddy, eastern provincial for the 7,000-member Oblates of Mary order, conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Humane Letters on Meany for his services to his nation, community and church. The convocation, including a dinner attended by more than 500 persons, marked the 10th anniversary of the college's award program singling out outstanding Catholic laymen.

Meany cited a number of problems confronting the nation—the threat of aggression from Soviet Russia and Communist China, rising unemployment, the steadily increasing cost of living, high interest rates, increasing pollution of the environment, and violence on the campus.

But a much more disturbing problem, Meany declared, is the attitude "of some segments of our population who seem to have developed a feeling of despair about the future of America. They seem to be losing faith in their own nation."

This feeling is reflected, he said, in "the actions of some of our young people, encouraged by the reaction of some of our older people, who should know better." Meany referred to "senseless rioting and destruction" on the campus and the burning and looting of college administration buildings.

He called "extremely disturbing" the failure of some in positions of authority to "measure up to the challenge to our educational system" inherent in campus disorders.

He cited dissident groups openly advocating violence to bring about change.

"We see firemen and policemen shot down by snipers" while trying to protect life and property, and "deliberate attempts to break down our system of justice . . . by making a travesty of our courts of law," he observed.

"We are told our young people don't like the world they have inherited—a world which they say they did not make." But "no mortal has ever been able to pre-select the kind of world he would like." Those born in the Twenties, Meany said, "inherited a world deep in depression and soon to be engulfed in the most destructive war in human history."

Meany said he refuses to believe that young people have lost faith in America, in its ideals and traditions.

"American labor has a stake in preserving our American institutions, and we intend to do what we can to prevent their destruction under any false label of progress," he declared.

Labor realizes, Meany said, that America has a system that "gives the ordinary citizen the opportunity and the right to join with others for the benefit of all—a right that does not exist anywhere behind the Iron Curtain."

"We in the AFL-CIO," he asserted, "are going to continue to work for a better America and for a better world without abandoning the basic principles of human decency and justice under which this nation was founded."

He concluded that "all of us, including students who have faith in America, can live and act in helping our nation overcome its pressing problems."

In accepting the degree, Meany said he did so as president of the AFL-CIO rather than as an individual. He said he regarded the honor as recognition of the important role played by American labor in the life of this nation.

Illinois Court Upholds Public Employe Strike

Springfield, Ill.—The Illinois State Supreme Court has handed down a precedent-setting decision affirming, in effect, the right to strike for 500,000 Illinois state and local public employes.

The Illinois ruling centered on a December 1968, strike by the State, County & Municipal Employes against a Peoria public nursing home. A State Circuit Court at Peoria issued an injunction against that walkout which eventually broke the strike.

But the state supreme court held that the Illinois Anti-Injunction Law was applicable to the Peoria dispute, that the injunction should not have been issued, and consequently, was invalid.

The injunction also resulted in a 60-day jail sentence for Harold L. Benedict, an SCME staff representative assigned to the local union. That sentence has been under appeal, and the court that imposed it will be asked to reconsider in light of the state supreme court ruling.

The anti-injunction law is one of more than a dozen so-called "Little Norris-LaGuardia" anti-injunction statutes in various states.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf called the ruling a "landmark decision," and said that Illinois public employes "are no longer second-class citizens. The supreme court decision confirms their right to bargain and to refuse to work when all other remedies have been exhausted."

He said the ruling could have an effect on public employe walkouts in other states because the Illinois decision might be used as a precedent in interpreting other existing state laws.

AFL-CIO Asks Letter Drive For Prisoners

"I urge every member of the AFL-CIO to take time at this holiday season to write to Hanoi. It is also a time for national prayer for those prisoners, as suggested by the American Legion.

"An end to the misery of the prisoners of war and relief for their long-suffering families would help to brighten this holiday season. It could also serve as a sincere indication of the North Vietnamese desire for peace in Indochina and lay the groundwork for their acceptance of the American proposal at the Paris talks to free all prisoners of war."

Meany advised that letters to Hanoi, which require 25 cents postage per half ounce, should be addressed to the President of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam, Hanoi, North Viet Nam.

Passage Climaxes 3-Year Struggle

By David L. Perlman

A landmark job safety and occupational health bill won final congressional approval and the AFL-CIO, which led the three-year battle for its passage, called on the Administration to follow through with a strong enforcement program.

The final version of the bill puts the responsibility for setting nationwide safety and health standards in the hands of the Secretary of Labor—where the AFL-CIO said it belonged.

The Administration and employer organizations lost their bid to assign standard-setting to a separate presidential commission.

But employers contesting Labor Dept. citations against violations will be able to appeal to an independent review board to be appointed by the President—a provision that was not in the original labor-supported Williams-Daniels bill.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany served notice that labor will keep a watchful eye on the enforcement machinery. If it doesn't work effecively, he declared, "we will immediately petition Congress to strengthen and improve it."

Meany termed passage of the legislation "a long step down the road toward a safe and healthy workplace." But he stressed that "achievement of that goal will not be automatic."

The new law will provide "the mechanism for setting safety and health standards by the Dept. of Labor," Meany noted.

But, he stressed, "mere setting of standards is not enough. There

House Votes Food Stamp Restrictions

A conservative coalition in the House won an unexpected—and undeserved—victory with the passage of a restrictive food stamp bill that would throw up new roadblocks to the goal of wiping out hunger in America.

With absenteeism high—in part because of a round of holiday season parties on Capitol Hill—a key vote was lost by a thin 119-116 margin. Two hundred House members missed this teller vote, in which members are counted but not recorded by name.

Later, after stragglers reached the House floor, liberals and moderates succeeded in defeating a proposal to bar food stamps to strikers and their families.

The anti-striker amendment was beaten on a 183-172 rollcall. But at this stage, the parliamentary situation was such that there was no

Meany Scores Nixon's Veto As Attack on Jobless, Poor

By John R. Oravec

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced as "outrageous" Pres. Nixon's veto of the employment and manpower legislation that would have created nearly a million jobs.

"It is a devastating attack on the unemployed, the unskilled, and the poor at a time of widespread joblessness, created by Administration policies," Meany declared.

Nixon's veto, Meany stressed, demonstrates the Administration's refusal to support its talk of reviving the economy with action and funds "where they count most—in upgrading the skills of the labor force and creating jobs for the long-term unemployed."

The veto drew expressions of shock and dismay from many members of Congress, but chances of overriding the veto appear slim. Although the measure passed the Senate 68 to 13, the House approved it by a much narrower margin—177 to 159.

House Democratic Leader Carl Albert said that the veto means Nixon "is more interested in playing political games than in the almost 5 million Americans who are out of work."

Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), chairman of the Labor Committee that worked for months devising the comprehensive legislation, said the veto "throws away" the efforts of both political parties in Congress.

Nixon's refusal to sign the legislation washes out for the present the labor-supported public service jobs program that was designed to combat high unemployment by providing work for persons who could not find employment in private industry.

But Meany emphasized that "it is only a temporary setback" and declared: "We intend to do everything in our power to help establish a badly needed national manpower policy and program, including job-creation for the long-term jobless. And we intend to win."

Industrial Output Drops For 4th Straight Month

Industrial production dropped for the fourth consecutive month in November even though the decline in auto output was checked.

The decline of seven-tenths of 1 percent was not as severe as that of the previous three months, but it still depressed the Federal Reserve Board index of factory, mine and utility output to 161.4 percent of the 1957-59 base period.

Since August, the industrial production index has nosedived 7.8 points. This is the second four-month decline in production that the nation has experienced during almost two years of the Nixon Administration. The previous four-month sag spanned the period of October 1969 through January 1970.

The FRB noted that the index in November was 7.6 percent below the peak level of 174.6 reached in July 1969.

Striking Clerks Approve Northwest Airlines Pact

Minneapolis—Members of the Railway & Airline Clerks voted by a 6-1 margin to accept strike-ending contract terms from Northwest Airlines after five months on the picket line.

The terms, agreed to in Washington meetings called by Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., were approved after an earlier vote to reject. A joint announcement by management and BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis said that an "expedited schedule for return to jobs" had been added to the earlier proposals made Oct. 22.

Northwest management began preparing to resume full service in time for the holidays. It had flown only a few routes since 3,500 union members walked out July 8 to get a contract on a par with those at comparable airlines.

A new 39-month pact offers average wage increases of 37.6 percent and improvements in classifications and work rules.

Salary raises will be paid retroactively from Oct. 1, 1969, to July 8, 1970, to employes who are recalled. Any employe not called back to work within four months will receive retroactive pay to the end of that time, the agreement provides.

Dennis called the settlement a

BAYARD RUSTIN chats with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) at the New York dinner honoring Rustin's leadership of the civil rights movement. The dinner raised funds for the A. Philip Randolph Institute, of which Rustin is executive director.

Urges Strengthened Coalition:

Rustin Keys Social Progress To Ballot Box, Union Card

By Rex Hardesty

New York—The ballot box and the union card are the only weapons that can bring economic justice to America, Bayard Rustin said at a dinner in his honor. And that goal won't be achieved until blacks and liberals quit confusing slogans, lifestyles and emotions with results, Rustin declared.

The dinner, which drew a crowd of 1,300 to raise funds for the A. Philip Randolph Institute, honored Rustin for his three decades as the top tactician of the civil rights movement. Rustin, now executive director of the Randolph Institute, organized the first freedom rides, the Journey for Reconciliation in 1946, the Montgomery bus boycott in the 1950s, the massive 1963 March on Washington and the 1968 Memphis march for Dr. Martin Luther King's funeral.

But now, Rustin said, civil rights activists must move from protest to politics and the effort won't be successful "unless we keep the blue-collar worker in our coalition and not drive him into Nixon's." Rustin termed Nixon's Administration a "national disaster for the poor and minorities."

Cautioning against relying on such slogans as "Uncle Tom" and "hard-hat" or on hair-dos and soul food instead of political action, Rustin said anyone who "goes around calling this the worst country in the world had just as well kick a black kid back into the ghetto, because if we can't give people hope we can't win."

As an example of the kind of action that is needed, Rustin introduced two groups in the audience, both made up predominantly of young blacks. One included representatives of the Institute's affiliated black trade unionists who work on voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives in 23 cities. The other was the staff of the joint apprenticeship program, which trains and counsels youngsters for apprenticeship in the building trades.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called the work of the Randolph Institute "one of the best investments the trade union movement ever made" when the AFL-CIO voted funds to it six years ago and announced plans for the expansion of institute activities. Meany cited the expansion of the apprenticeship program, Operation Outreach, into 80 U.S. cities under the sponsorship of various groups. He said the number of apprentices placed now totals 7,200, double that of 18 months ago.

Meany observed that the hopes of minority youth have been "curtailed by the present national economic picture." Two years ago, he recalled, when the Administration's economic "game plan" was handed down "from the ivory tower in which Dr. Arthur Burns sits," labor was assured that it would not hurt the worker through higher unemployment. "We even got it with a signature," Meany said, referring to Nixon's February 1969 letter to the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

But now, Meany said, with unemployment approaching 6 percent the "architect of this economic mess," Burns, has a prescription calling for repeal of prevailing area wage scales on federal projects; compulsory arbitration, "an idea that went out in 1890;" amending the minimum wage law with a lower rate for teenagers, "without saying what happens to the people these teenagers squeeze out;" and a tax credit for business investment, "the same tax bonus we got rid of recently" as inflationary.

As a result, Meany said, it is getting hard to tell "fact from fiction in this Administration, and you can't even be sure of what happened yesterday." Meany said the results of the 1970 election offer hope that people can be motivated to change the situation.

Roy Wilkins, director of the NAACP, told the group that besides being the human rights movement's "foremost exemplar of smart tactics," Rustin is also a humanitarian who worked in India and "in Africa when it wasn't fashionable because of his compassion and love of all the people of the earth. He has had compassion even when he was scolding black militants for their failure to appreciate proper tactics."

John P. Roche, a Brandeis professor and newspaper columnist, said the "sense of community" displayed through the years by such men as Randolph, Rustin, Wilkins and Meany is missing today among "the friendly radicals who brought us Richard Nixon."

Roche said that when the effort was made in 1939 to get Rustin off a chain gang after he was arrested for civil rights activities, "no cocktail party was given by Leonard Bernstein," chiding the event the composer held for the Black Panthers.

Senators Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) and Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) attended the testimonial to Rustin and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, master of ceremonies, introduced Bayh as the man who made possible the Senate rejection of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court.

Kirkland also introduced an empty chair which was placed at the dais to dramatize the absence of Cesar Chavez, the Farm Workers' leader who could not attend because he was in jail in California.

Label Trades Leader Joseph Lewis Mourned

Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. since 1956, died unexpectedly in a Florida hospital of a heart attack. He was 64.

Known to both labor and management as a tireless promoter of the union label and the annual Union-Industries Show, Lewis was eating breakfast in a Citrus Memorial Hospital bed at Inverness, Fla., when he died Dec. 14 after a third heart seizure. His doctor and family had believed he was on the road to recovery after previous hospitalization.

Services were held Dec. 16 at Gawler's Funeral Home in Washington and scheduled Dec. 18 at the Chapel of the Roses funeral home in Fremont, Calif., with internment set for Dec. 19 at Holy Sepulcher Cemetery, Hayward, Calif.

In a message expressing shock and sadness at news of the death, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said of Lewis that "his long service to his fellow workers, to the trade union movement and to the Union Label Dept. were well known by all of us in the AFL-CIO who considered him our friend."

Meany sent a personal message of condolence to Lewis's wife Gladys of Silver Spring, Md., and their daughter, Mrs. Mary Graminski. Also surviving are 11 grandchildren, including three in the family of Lewis's only son, Joseph, who preceded his father in death—also of a heart attack—10 weeks ago at age 40.

Richard F. Walsh, president of the department of which Lewis was executive officer, said his death "comes as a grievous blow to all who knew and admired and respected him." His "kind nature and intense dedication to the principles and ideals of the trade union movement will long serve as a living tribute to his memory," Walsh said.

Lewis and his wife were vacationing at their winter place near Inverness when he suffered chest pains and was ordered to the Citrus hospital. Released after a three-week stay, he suffered another attack Dec. 12 and returned for his final visit.

Lewis was born in Centerville, Calif., in 1906. At 17 he left school to work at the Wedgewood Stove Co., where he joined a local of the Stove Mounters Union in 1930.

Two years later he was elected president of the union's Local 61 in Newark, Calif. After three years in that post the international union—now the Stove, Furnace & Allied Appliance Workers—named him a vice president and, in 1944, president. He was re-elected at every convention through 1956, when he was named secretary-treasurer of the Union Label department after four years as a vice president.

Jobless Claims Could Reach $4.9 Billion

With nearly 5 million American workers now unemployed, the Labor Dept. is predicting that unemployment compensation benefits could reach $4.9 billion for fiscal 1971—nearly double the $2.8 billion paid unemployed workers in fiscal 1970.

Even if there is a marked improvement in the economy during the balance of fiscal 1971, jobless benefits will be high, the report noted.

It said that "a marked improvement" could lower from 4.2 percent to 3.6 percent the number of workers who file claims under the federal-state unemployment insurance program.

Benefit expenditures at that level would amount to $4.2 billion for the present fiscal year.

Initial claims for unemployment compensation during the week of Dec. 5 totaled 398,600, the highest December volume since 1960. This was 44,500 higher than the previous week, and 151,600 more than for the comparable week in 1969.

Insured unemployment totaled 2,192,900 during the week ending Nov. 28—202,800 more than the previous week and 1,030,700 more than a year ago.

Industrial Output Drops For 4th Straight Month

showed little change from October, running at an annual rate of about 4 million units. The General Motors strike had been blamed for declines in auto output in September and October.

The FRB said that output declines in November "were centered in business and defense equipment and industrial materials."

Besides auto production, the FRB said, there was little change in the output of other consumer goods, both durable and nondurable.

The report showed a dramatic fall-off in business investment in new machinery and equipment. The total output of business equipment last month was 12 percent below the 1969 high, the FRB reported.

Other declines for November were recorded in steel, construction material and other industrial materials.

The FRB report was released a few hours after Pres. Nixon visited the Commerce Dept. to announce that the gross national product had reached an annual rate of $1 trillion for the first time. The announcement came with the unveiling of a "GNP clock" that ticks off increases at the rate of $2,000 a second.

None of the Administration officials at the ceremony mentioned that the GNP clock marks up inflation along with "real" output.

The real GNP—expressed in 1958 dollars—has shown little change in the last 15 months of the Nixon Administration, reaching $727.5 billion at the end of the third quarter. Unadjusted for price increases, the GNP as of Sept. 30 was running at an annual rate of $985.5 billion.

With the decline in industrial production last month, the FRB index now stands 7.7 points below the 169.1 mark when Pres. Nixon was inaugurated in January 1969.

Independents Support New York Taxi Strike

New York—Taxicab drivers, on strike for the first time since they won their first union contract in 1966, met with independent drivers who own their cabs and voted to stay on strike, with the backing of the independents, until a new agreement is won.

Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York City AFL-CIO and of Taxi Local 3036, told the meeting that talks mediated by Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board have gotten nowhere.

McDonnell later said he would try again for a settlement of the strike called Dec. 5 when 69 of 72 fleet owners refused to budge from an offer the drivers had rejected earlier.

The union, chartered by the AFL-CIO after two eight-day strikes in 1966, represents 36,000 drivers and 1,200 mechanics, gasoline men, utility workers and body men employed in fleet garages. Its three-year contract expired Nov. 16, but was extended 17 days in the hope of getting an agreement.

Local 3036 started the contract renewal process by requesting early negotiations. These began June 3, but stalled when fleet owners laid down conditions the union rejected. The impasse point remains the owners' demand that 15 cents of every fare on a cab meter be used to pay for contract benefits the men already get, with the remainder to be divided 50-50. Union members see this as a 46.25 percent commission for the drivers instead of the present 49 to 50 percent.

Meanwhile the strikers have been conducting mass picketing at air terminals, bus depots and hotels to discourage unlicensed drivers from picking up passengers on a "gypsy" basis—a violation of city ordinances, the union says.

2 Million to Benefit:

Conferees Approve 2 Federal Pay Bills

House and Senate conferees have reached agreement on a pair of labor-supported bills that would mean higher pay for about 2 million federal employes.

The twin bills, awaiting the final step of congressional approval, would:

● Establish a new pay-setting system for 1.3 million salaried white-collar employes. They would be virtually assured of a pay raise next month and annual salary adjustments thereafter.

● Add an additional pay step—worth 4 percent—to the wage board system which matches the pay of nearly 600,000 blue-collar workers to prevailing area wage scales. Another section of the bill would establish a modified wage board system for about 130,000 employes of military post exchanges and other self-financing activities.

Under the white-collar salary bill, annual pay adjustments would be automatic unless both the President and Congress determine that emergency conditions dictate otherwise.

Here's how the system would work:

The President would be obligated to put into effect salary increases averaging slightly above 6 percent, effective as of Jan. 1, 1971.

The amount is based on comparable wages in private industry last June, determined by an already-completed salary survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

No further action would be required by Congress.

The same system would be followed for pay increases effective Jan. 1, 1972—based on that year's BLS survey.

The next pay hike would be due on Oct. 1, 1972, and on the same date in subsequent years—thus reducing the lag between salary survey and federal pay adjustment from six months to three months.

In 1972, also, unions would be brought directly into the pay-setting procedure through a new Federal Employes Pay Council which would be consulted on the methods of determining comparability and which would make recommendations to the President.

Congress would enter the salary picture only if the President declared that "national emergency or economic conditions affecting the general welfare" required a smaller increase or a deferral of the increase.

In such a case, the President would be required to submit an alternative plan to Congress.

But either the House or Senate could reject the President's alternative plan by a majority vote within 30 days. And if either body turned him down, the full pay increase would be granted without any change in the effective date.

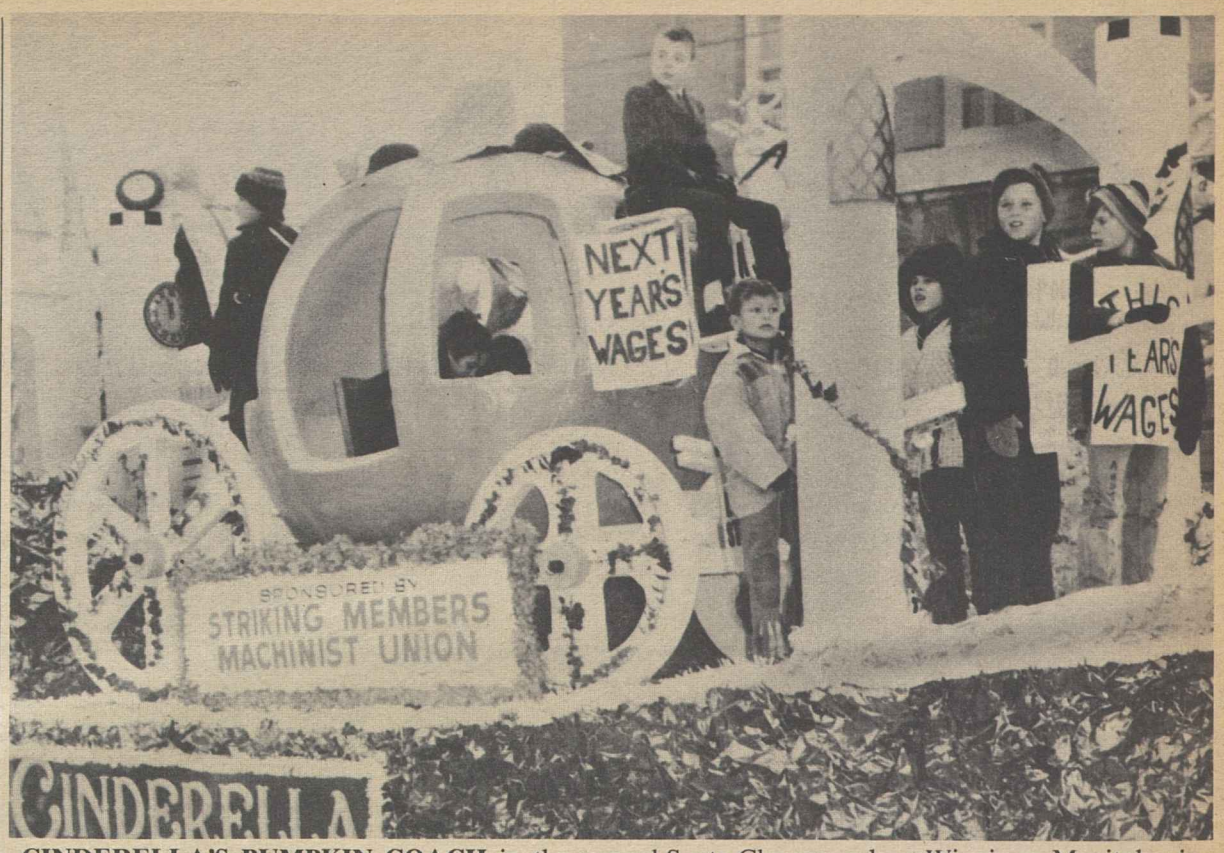
Genesis of the legislation was a bill passed by the House more than a year ago which included the salary-setting procedure in addition to its most-publicized provision — a 5.4 percent pay raise for postal employes.

The Senate substituted its own version of a pay bill, but a hassle over postal reorganization stymied any further action. New legislation moved through Congress as the result of labor-management negotiations following the wildcat postal strikes of last spring.



The original bill was all but forgotten—until the House and Senate conferees were brought together in a successful effort to salvage the salary-setting provision.

The separate wage board bill adds a fourth step to the three-stage wage board system now in effect.

As at present, workers begin with 96 percent of the prevailing area wage, move up to 100 percent after 26 weeks, and 78 weeks later advance to 104 percent. Two years after reaching the third step, under the new legislation, workers would receive 108 percent of the base rate.

The Defense Dept. had opposed the bill as too costly and Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes charged that the department had grossly exaggerated the cost of the bill in an effort to defeat it.

The House had initially passed a five-step bill, raising the ceiling for long-service workers to 112 percent of the base rate. But the conferees agreed to the four-step version.

Meany Urges Colleges to Expand Programs for Labor Education

New York—Organized labor must work to build and strengthen educational institutions both inside and outside the labor movement or "we will be throwing away the only tools we have for building a better society," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asserted here.

Meany spoke at a dinner marking the 25th anniversary of the New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations at Cornell University. (Excerpts, Page 4.)

Meany was introduced to the audience of nearly 600 persons by E. Howard Molisani, first vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and vice president of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Other speakers were Dr. David G. Moore, dean of the labor relations school; Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Meany recalled that establishment of the school by a 1944 act of the legislature came only after a long struggle in which the New York labor movement played a leading part and in which he, as president of the State AFL, had been deeply involved.

Despite the school's success, he said, "America's educational system has not responded to this opportunity." He noted that no more than 25 American universities had even tried to set up meaningful labor studies facilities, leaving "vast stretches" where the only labor education was what unions were able to improvise for themselves.

Citing the South as one such area, he said he was looking forward to accepting an invitation recently received from former Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for the AFL-CIO to hold a collective bargaining seminar at the LBJ School of Public Affairs when it opens its doors at the University of Texas next year.

Meany expressed the hope that other southern universities would enter the field of labor education in view of the fact that "the impact of trade unionism is being felt in the South as never before."

Drawing on his own experience in New York, he observed that legislatures and university regents do not respond to need "without a great deal of prodding" and that involvement of labor is necessary not only to get a beginning but to assure adequate funding from year to year.

Labor education, to be effective, Meany said, must be a mutual undertaking of organized labor and the academic world and labor must not be limited to an advisory pro-forma role.

Such cooperation does not mean competition, he emphasized. The role of advisers is to advise and administrators to administer, he said, but both jobs are important because "unless a program is responsive to labor's needs it is not useful."

Thus, he observed, the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in Washington does not compete with any university, but does the things no university is equipped to do:

● It promotes among union members the widest possible understanding of the aims of labor.

● It helps affiliated unions develop their own educational programs.

No union has succeeded in creating an educational program that fills its needs, Meany said, "but all are increasingly conscious of the need to do so."

In this area, he predicted that increased use of the Labor Studies Center by affiliated unions would stimulate them to seek broader, more effective programs from the universities.

"And the universities should be prepared to help them," he added. "It is clearer every day that the labor movement has important work to do in behalf of the entire American society and that it needs all the help it can get from universities and elsewhere."

Labor's aim is "the highest development of the whole nation and all its people," he said. "So we look on learning, studying and understanding as the bedrock on which we will continue to build a society based on equity, justice and human growth."

To do this will mean, Meany said, that labor must continue to fight for more and better educational facilities, research centers, teachers and schooling itself because "learning is a lifetime process, the most important human activity there is."

Neglect of U.S. Shipping Held National Disgrace

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., (D-N.J.) said that allowing American foreign trade cargo carried by U.S.-flag ships to slip below the 5 percent level is a "national disgrace."

Speaking at a luncheon sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., Thompson called the feeble cargo percentage a product of "our pathetic neglect of the merchant marine."

"U.S.-flag ships carried almost half of our nation's total foreign trade cargo just 20 years ago," he noted. "Just 10 years ago the U.S.-flag merchant fleet still sailed with more than 10 percent of its nation's cargo."

Thompson said that Congress had "shouldered its burden nobly" by overwhelmingly passing the Merchant Marine Act of 1970, and that it is ready to do so now to combat the cargo problem.

"We have cargo preference laws that require a minimum of half of all federal cargoes to be shipped in U.S. vessels," he said. "Yet some agencies of government have taken that to be a maximum and actually give preference to foreign bottoms."

The congressman reprimanded both government agencies and American industry for the major part they have played in contributing to the problem—refusing to "send even half of their precious cargo under the American flag."

But, he said more optimistically, there are encouraging signs from both of these quarters.

"First of all, the Dept. of Commerce launched a 'Ship-American' campaign, and what a commendable campaign it is," he said.

"Secondly, we have recently seen announcements by some auto makers and some major oil companies to the effect that they will now send their cargoes by American-flag ships whenever possible.

"If this trend grows," he concluded, "we will again have a merchant marine of first-class standing."

'Crisis' in Health Costs Stressed by Biemiller

The AFL-CIO extended thanks to Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) for bringing to public attention "the crisis of costs in the health industry" and stressed that organized labor will continue its fight for National Health Insurance when the 92nd Congress convenes.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in a letter to Mills that he had made "a significant contribution by pointing out the dangers of cost-plus reimbursement which contribute to the escalating costs of medical care."

Mills, chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee, told a group of Westinghouse executives Dec. 1 that health costs have risen from $12 billion to $60 billion in the past 20 years.

Commending Mills for focusing attention on the cost problem, Biemiller said: "The American people need to know the exact dimensions of escalating health care costs and they need the protections and benefits which we are convinced are achieveable through National Health Insurance."

He said organized labor's fight for a comprehensive national health care plan has been given further impetus by predictions of the Social Security Administration that the American public may be spending as much as $120 billion a year for health care by 1975 and as much as $189 billion by 1980.

Biemiller cited the AFL-CIO's prediction that National Health Insurance could save the nation between $29 and $32 billion on health care in 1975 and perhaps as much as $61 billion in 1980.

He dismissed as a "gross exaggeration" the estimate of Under Sec. John Veneman of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare that National Health Insurance would cost $77 billion in 1974.

But, he said, even if Veneman's figures are accepted, National Health Insurance could save between $6 and $12 billion in 1975, and between $17 and $30 billion in 1980.

'What Must Be Done'

IT IS CLEARER every day that the labor movement has important work to do in behalf of the entire American society, and that it needs all the help it can get.

So it is unfortunate that there seems to be a view in certain parts of the academic world that labor's problem is smugness and self-satisfaction, and that it needs a great deal of abrasive criticism to open its eyes.

In this arrogant conviction, from time to time we see academic facilities turned over to labor's enemies to use as a forum for attacking labor.

Well, I think it is clear that we are not satisfied. That is a word we don't use. We are proud of what we have accomplished so far. We have made progress. We have come a long way. But we are very much aware that we have a long way to go.

We have plenty of critics who never tire of pointing that out.

We often face attacks from outsiders who not only exaggerate our failures but pretend that we secretly aim at failure and resist improvement.

There are people who say the universities are not perfect, and therefore the universities ought to be destroyed.

There are people who say that the labor movement has not achieved perfection, and therefore the labor movement ought to be destroyed.

Well, that is nonsense. We are going to improve the universities. We are going to improve the labor movement.

IF WE DON'T build and strengthen these institutions, correct their faults to the best of our ability and improve them in every way we know how, we will be throwing away the only tools we have for building a better society. For workers, this is the only game in town, and all our stakes are in it. It is our intention to build a better society than has ever before existed. The labor movement is totally committed to that effort. We aim at the highest development of the whole nation and all its people.

All its people, regardless of race, sex, income, inheritance, occupation or anything else.

We in labor believe that every American—not just union members—should have decent clothing, decent housing and enough to eat.

We believe that every American should have the right to make a constructive contribution in return—everyone should have worthwhile work to do, at a decent wage.

We believe every American should have access to decent health care.

And we believe every American must have the chance to develop himself to his highest possible potential—to learn and create and liberate the best human qualities that are in him.

We are convinced that no organization and no society can survive and grow unless it makes provision for the well-being and growth of every one of its members.

We look on learning and studying and understanding as the bedrock on which we will continue to build a society based on equity, justice and human growth. That, we believe, is what must be done.

Never Let the Facts Interfere With Interesting News Release

By John P. Roche

THERE HAVE BEEN times these last two years when I have felt very sheepish about my delayed response to the vital events of the day. The scenario would run like this: on June 15 a special commission submits to the President a report on crime, pornography, the Pentagon or any one of a dozen other topics. On June 16, columns start appearing all over the country explaining the true significance of the report.

Now, I am a fast reader. Yet by the time I had penetrated halfway into the Fitzhugh report on the Pentagon or the Scranton Commission report on campus unrest, every other writer in America seemed to have digested these substantial volumes, meditated on them, and brought in a verdict.

In fact, with regard to the Scranton Commission report, it seemed to me that half a dozen columnists, a dozen senators and the Vice President of the United States had their reviews in before the commission had even prepared its final document. It appeared that not only did I need a speed-reading course, but some advanced training in divination. Very depressing.

Feeling acute guilt that I was letting my readers down, I took my troubles to one of the proverbial wise men of journalism, Ken Crawford of Newsweek. "John, you actually read the Fitzhugh report?" he asked. I admitted that I had. "My God," said Crawford, "you should get a medal. I don't think even Fitzhugh has read the Fitzhugh report."

Then light dawned. "You didn't get the potted handout?" Ken asked. "You missed the backgrounder?" I had not been in Washington when the report was released and, as a consequence, had obviously missed the backgrounder, the press conference at which it was passed out and the press was briefed on the contents. As for the "handout"—a summary prepared for the press highlighting a document's conclusions — I always threw them away. (Just as I do the model book reviews that publishers kindly include with advance copies of books.)

Ken thought about my reading hangup for a while, then thoughtfully he delivered his judgment: "You may miss a lot of scoops with this bad habit of yours, but in time things should break about even. About half the scoops are phonies." (He was vindicated a few weeks ago when the news came out that Pat Moynihan was going to be U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. This was deductively absurd, the equivalent of a story "Pope Paul Converted to Buddhism." I just chuckled and let it ride to its inevitable denouement.)

WHAT I THINK of as "Crawford's Law" was vindicated in an extremely thoughtful article in the Washington Post by Richard Harwood. He called it "News: A Question of What the Facts Will Support," and dealt in depth with a recent flurry of stories that a Pentagon report, examining the logistical performance in Viet Nam, had accused the Johnson Administration of "botching" the Vietnamese War. His verdict? That the actual content of the report would not support this contention, that the allegations (in Harwood's words) "arose in the minds of reporters, some of whom had not even read through the dreary volumes."

What made this particularly interesting to me was that I was in Washington the day this story hit the papers. My first reaction, given my morbid interest in the war in Viet Nam, was to get a copy of this "Besson report." The Pentagon informed me there were no copies for distribution, but that I could come over there to read it—and that it constituted three thick volumes plus appendices. Ugh!

Deductively, I could not believe the report had said what it allegedly did—our logistical performance in Viet Nam has been spectacular—but I was not going to spend three days at the Pentagon to write a column on the subject. True, someone at the Pentagon might have been willing to write the column for me, but there is enough of that already. I'll just stick to being a slow reactor.

Election Results Show Strength Of Basic Democratic Coalition

The following is excerpted from "The Voters' Decision-1970," by John M. Barry, which appears in the December 1970 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE 1970 ELECTION results were mixed enough to offer political partisans of every stripe a chance to claim victory—an offer few of them turned down. But when all the statistics are sifted, the gains and losses analyzed, the claims and counter-claims weighed, the conclusion is inescapable that the Democratic Party came out ahead and took a long step toward the strength it will need to recapture the White House in 1972.

On its face, in terms of the actual arithmetic of the election, the Democratic achievement was not particularly remarkable. It takes on major significance, however, when viewed against the demoralized and disorganized state of the party just two years ago. In 1968, the Democrats not only suffered defeat, but came close to total disintegration as a party.

This resurgence by the Democrats differs only in degree from the comeback of the Republican Party in 1966. Two years earlier, the GOP was devastated when it shifted sharply to the right and ran an ultra-conservative, Barry Goldwater, as its candidate for President. Not only was Goldwater crushed by the Lyndon Johnson landslide, but he carried so many GOP candidates down with him that the party's ranks in the House and Senate reached their lowest point since the era of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The 1966 off-year elections proved a turning point for the Republicans as they increased their membership in the House by 47 seats and gained a net of three more senators. From that point they went on to win the White House in 1968, and GOP leaders began confidently to lay the groundwork for a major bid this year to gain outright control of the Senate and at least narrow the Democratic margin in the House.

But in 1970 things began to go wrong for the Republicans, and once again most of the party's troubles could be traced to a shift to the right. The shift was not nearly so sharp as in 1964, but it was perceptible to the voters and they simply would not buy it.

For one thing, the Administration's economic policies had gotten it into deep trouble with the electorate. It may have sounded reasonable enough in 1969 to blame inflation on the Johnson Administration and the war in Viet Nam, but this explanation had a hollow ring by 1970 as prices continued to climb despite monthly assurances that they were under control. Meanwhile, as a direct consequence of the Administration's strategy in attempting to combat inflation, the unemployment rolls mounted alarmingly.

Understandably, the chief national spokesmen for the Republican Party during the mid-term congressional elections—Pres. Nixon and Vice Pres. Agnew—sought to avoid discussion of the national economy as a campaign issue. Instead, they seemed to stake all their party's hopes on the belief propounded repeatedly by conservative columnists that the electorate was following a clear trend toward conservatism. And they attempted to translate this into the argument that only Republicans were concerned with the so-called social issues—crime, campus disruption, bombings, narcotics and the lot.

THE CAMPAIGNING of the Vice President especially may have backfired and cost the GOP several contests it otherwise might have won. In his forays across the country, he seemed bent not so much on electing Republicans as on purging what he called "radical liberals"—mostly Democrats but with an occasional non-conforming Republican thrown in, like Sen. Charles Goodell. And when Agnew compressed the phrase into "radiclibs," the whole bit was an ominous reminder of the "com-symp" line coined by Nixon in his own vice presidential campaigning.

Agnew obviously was playing a role in the campaign that was carefully plotted as part of the overall Republican design. Nixon, while employing the same basic "law and order" pitch, did so on a higher plane, leaving the invective and the alliterative catch-phrases to the Vice President.

Far from revealing a conservative trend in the nation, the results of the voting in 1970 reinforce the argument that the public is repelled by conservative excesses, a lesson that the GOP should have learned in 1964. They show, too, that the Democratic Party still has vast reservoirs of support in the electorate.

Most important of all, perhaps, the election produced new evidence that the old New Deal coalition of workers, liberals and minorities is very much alive and remains an effective base for winning elections. Even the South, the one element of the coalition that seemed to defect in 1968, this time left the GOP wondering whether its vaunted southern strategy is really going to produce the results the party is seeking and needs.

It is clear that Democrats did well where they have traditionally done well. An NBC sampling of votes for congressional seats in 1,500 precincts across the country showed that the Democratic candidates drew 69 percent of the votes of blue collar workers, 75 percent of low-income voters, 59 percent among city dwellers and 90 percent of the votes in Negro precincts. Moreover, the party improved its position among middle-income voters, getting 58 percent of the vote, and in rural areas, 55 percent. Only among the rich, 65 percent, and among white suburbanites, 51 percent, did the GOP come out ahead on the average. Nationally, the Associated Press estimated that Democrats received 53 percent of the total vote, based on balloting for governor or, where there was no gubernatorial race, for senator.

Federal Funding Could Provide Realistic Retirement Benefits

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS could keep social security benefits more in line with today's increased living costs — with no additional tax burden for the 80 million Americans covered by the system—the AFL-CIO said on network radio.

Prospects for general revenue financing for social security are "not good this year," said AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, but they could improve in the next Congress. He noted that both the House and the Senate did give serious consideration to the new financing feature in the current session. Seidman appeared on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Inflation, with a steep rise of living costs in the past two years, has left many of those dependent on social security unable to meet even minimum needs, he said.

He called for an immediate 10-percent increase in benefits, followed by another 10-percent improvement next year. Seidman noted that the Senate now is considering a 10-percent increase despite a warning from the Administration that "any increase larger than [the 5 percent increase] passed by the House . . . would be courting a presidential veto."

He declined to speculate "at what level [of improvement] the President will veto a bill," but stressed that "a very substantial increase" is desperately needed by the "old and disabled, and orphans, and widows, who depend on social security."

Seidman also urged retention of the "100-percent widow's benefit" provision contained in both the House and Senate versions of the social security bill, setting a widow's benefits at the level of her deceased husband's entitlement, whether he died before or after retirement age.

"This is very important, because the degree of poverty among widows is very high," he stressed, stating they are "probably the poorest group in America."

Reporters questioning Seidman were Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE ARE JUST seven members of the Federal Reserve Board and they pretty much determine how much interest you are going to pay on that mortgaged house of yours—if you can wangle a mortgage at all.

They serve on Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation for fourteen years and their job is to manage the nation's money supply and bank credit.

The Federal Reserve System—a cherished achievement of the Woodrow Wilson Administration—was established in 1913, largely as a result of the 1907 panic which had produced many bank failures and a painful depression. A lengthy study of the nation's monetary system, largely dominated by private commercial banks at the time, convinced Wilson and Congress that a more orderly and responsible system was needed.

The Federal Reserve System was the result. It operates under a Board of Governors of seven members. The board presides over 12 Federal Reserve banks, each located in one of the 12 regions into which the country has been divided. These banks hold the reserve balances of their member commercial banks and the deposit accounts of the U.S. Treasury. They perform a number of services for their member banks including loans and check clearance.

The job of the system is to regulate the nation's money supply and banking system in such a way that national production is maintained at a growing level and that consumption and employment are held at a high level. In addition, the system is expected to maintain the stability of the dollar.

The board has a number of techniques by which this is supposed to be accomplished.

- It can buy or sell government securities in the open market to maintain a proper money supply and stabilize the bond market.
- It can determine the discount rate, that is, the rate at which member banks can borrow from the system. These banks, in turn, set their prime rate for their most favored customers who, in turn, set their rates and so on ad infinitum.
- It can determine what reserves must be maintained by member banks. This, in turn, determines how much these banks can lend out. A one-point change in the ratio of reserves to loans can make a huge difference in the availability of money.

By tightening up or loosening up on all these instruments, the board can largely control the monetary policies of the United States, a control that, of course, can have immense significance on the state of the economy and jobs.

Currently the board has entered a thorny "political thicket" that would seem to be clearly outside its legislated function—its chairman has extended the setting of monetary policies into the field of labor-management relations.

Board Chairman Arthur Burns, a Nixon appointee, recently made a speech in which he outlined a number of steps that might be taken to combat inflation outside the monetary field. He suggested that it might be desirable to suspend the Davis-Bacon Act which sets prevailing wages on government contracts "to help restore order in the construction trades" as one step that could be taken to drive down wage boosts in the construction industry.

He further suggested that the minimum wage be "modified" so as to "improve job opportunities for teenagers."

He even went so far as to speak of the "compulsory arbitration of labor disputes in industries that vitally involve the public interest" and establishment of a "wage board" to review contract settlements.

All these suggestions are far from the original concept of the Federal Reserve System as a monetary, rather than a social or political instrument, to control inflation. The labor movement has strongly condemned these Burns comments as representing the application of the old and long-rejected "trickle down" theory.

How Pres. Nixon responds to them remains to be seen.

FEDERAL FUNDS should help finance social security to let benefits keep pace with national living standards without increasing the tax load on the 80 million Americans protected by the system, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance. The public affairs radio interview is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual network.

Liberals Miss Vote:

House Bill Imposes Food Stamp Curbs

way to revive the improved food stamp bill and the only path open was to pass the bill drawn up by the conservative House Agriculture Committee and hope that it would be improved in a conference committee compromise with a vastly superior Senate-passed bill.

The labor-liberal coalition had pledges of support from enough House members in advance of the vote to assure passage of a substitute bill sponsored by Rep. Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) and Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.).

Alarmed by heavy absenteeism as the debate got under way, supporters of the labor-backed bill sought to round up absent congressmen to be on the House floor for the scheduled 7:30 p.m. vote. But not enough showed up in time.

The bill passed by the House would discourage states and counties from continuing or establishing food stamp programs by requiring them to assume a gradually increased share of the cost.

It would bar food stamps to any family with an able-bodied adult who does not accept any job to which he or she is referred —no matter how substandard and without regard to suitability or prevailing wages. By contrast, the Senate bill has safeguards as to type of employment that must be accepted.

The Senate bill and the Quie-Foley substitute would have required food stamp program in every county in the nation—at no cost to the state or local government. Both would have provided free food stamps for the lowest-income families. And while the Senate bill bases the amount of food stamps on a low-cost budget, the House-passed version is based on a bare subsistance diet.

The Senate version would provide a simplified eligibility procedure, allow stamps to be used to buy soap and other household cleansing materials and in numerous other ways be an improvement over both the present program and the House bill. The Administration has made it clear that it prefers the House bill to the Senate version.

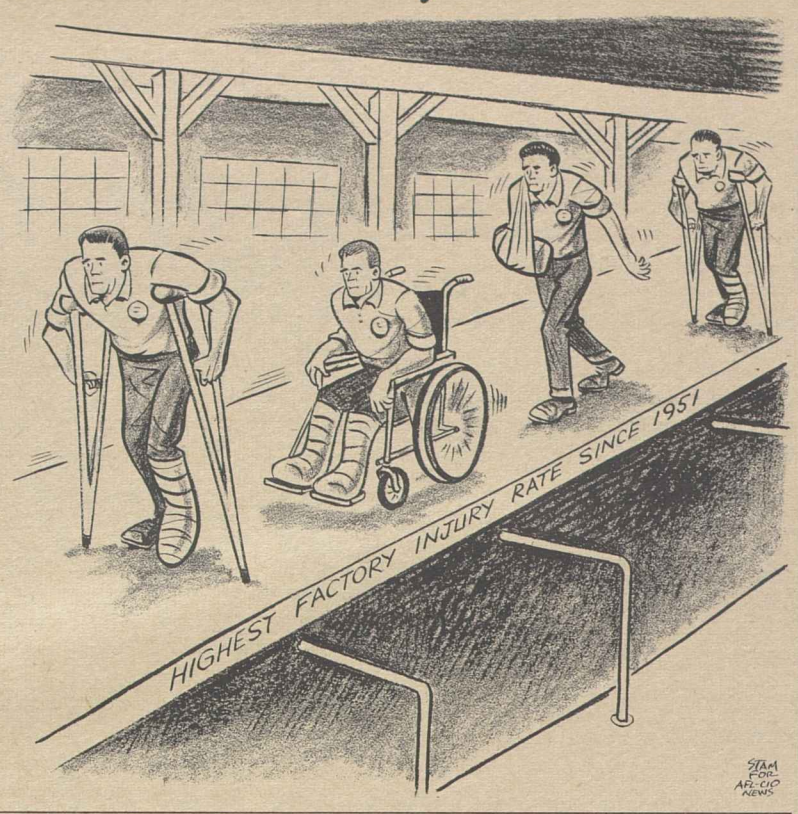
The entire program will expire on Jan. 31 unless legislation is enacted to contiue it—a deadline that makes final action before adjournment imperative.

Increasingly, it began to appear that the 91st Congress will have to stay in sesion until it is constitutionally dissolved on Jan. 3 in order to dispose of even a significant portion of its heavy backlog.

With filibuster threats in the Senate hanging over a basket of controversial bills and conference reports, Pres, Nixon served notice that he would call Congress back into session if it adjourned without acting on a list of "vital measures."

He put on his "must" list the family assistance program, financing of the supersonic transport program, the limited trade bill the Administration has proposed, increased social security benefits and defense apropriations.

Mansfield served notice that the Senate might have to stay in session until the last minute, with only an abbreviated Christmas recess.



Mansfield also put the Senate on a two-shift operation—at least until Dec. 22. From 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., he said, controversial bills which have been subject to filibuster threats will be considered. The late afternoons and possibly evenings would be devoted to bills that can be acted on quickly.

Senate opponents of SST financing were seeking to block a vote on a Dept. of Transportation appropriations bill that includes $210 million for the SST.

And awaiting floor action was a conglomerate bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee that attaches to social security legislation an improved version of the House-passed trade bill, a new proposal for "catastrophic" major medical insurance, and a token test in several cities of variations of the family assistance program.

Likely to be passed soon is a conference agreement on a comprehensive bill to curb air pollution, which Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) described as "by far the toughest pollution measure ever submitted to Congress."

Illinois AFL-CIO Leader R. G. Soderstrom Dies

Streator, Ill.—Reuben G. Soderstrom, who led the Illinois labor movement for 40 years until his retirement a few weeks ago, died here at 82. He had been hospitalized since Mar. 15 by a heart attack and stroke.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in messages of sympathy to the family and Illinois labor that Soderstrom's "long and illustrious career of service to his fellow man and to the trade union movement won for him the regard of all of us." He was, the message said, a labor pioneer who "served his fellow workers with devotion and distinction."

Funeral services were scheduled at Park Presbyterian Church in Streator on Dec. 18.

Born on a Minnesota farm, Soderstrom was a largely self-educated man, having quit school at 12 to take a job in a glass factory. He became an apprentice printer in 1906 and won a journeyman's card in Streator Local 138 of the Typographical Union in 1910. He later served as president of his local and president of the former Streator Trades & Labor Assembly.

He became president of the Illinois AFL in 1930, and at merger in 1958, was chosen without opposition as first president of the State AFL-CIO.

Soderstrom was a delegate to every AFL and AFL-CIO convention since 1930. He served as secretary of the resolutions committee at AFL conventions for many years and helped draft many of labor's major policy statements.

He was a state legislator from 1918 to 1936 and for several terms was chairman of the House Committee on Education. The first Illinois measure providing pensions for the blind was written by Soderstrom.

Survivors include his son, State Rep. Carl W. Soderstrom, and five grandchildren. They asked that, in lieu of flowers, gifts be made to the R. G. Soderstrom Educational Fund of the Illinois AFL-CIO, 300 N. State St., Chicago 60610.

Factory Injury Rate Jumps to 18-Year High

The rate of disabling injuries in manufacturing industries has risen to its highest point in 18 years, according to a report by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics covering 1969.

The bureau said the injury-frequency rate — the number of disabling injuries per million manhours worked — increased from 14.0 in 1968 to 14.8 in 1969, the highest since 1951 when the rate was 15.5.

The rate has continued to worsen since 1958 when a low of 11.4 was achieved, the report noted.

Coal mining continues to have the highest injury-frequency rate with 41.2. Following closely is trucking and warehousing at 36.4. Rated third is the lumber and wood products industry at 34.6.

The frequency rate of disabling injuries in the contract-construction industry rose to 28.0 in 1969, up from 26.9 in 1968 and 26.7 in 1967. This adverse trend comes after a long period of generally declining rates of injury in construction from a high of 32.1 in 1959.

High rates also were reported for food products, furniture, stone, glass and clay products and fabricated metal products.

Of the 21 major industrial manufacturing groups, only three showed a decrease in the rate of disabling injuries during 1969. These were in tobacco, lumber and leather.

Substantially higher rates were reported for the ordnance, petroleum, paper, primary metals and rubber groups.

The rate for wholesale and retail trade, 11.6 in 1969, was also up from the 1968 rate of 11.3.

The injury-frequency rate for the federal government—6.7 in 1969—was down from 6.9 in 1968.

Among the safest industries, the report noted, are communications, banking and insurance.

Talks Recessed Until January In Rail Dispute

Negotiations in the railroad wage dispute recessed for the holidays after unions representing 425,000 rail employes called off a one-day strike and returned to work.

Negotiators for both sides in the drawn-out wage talks will be called to meet shortly after Jan. 1, the Labor Dept. said, to continue seeking agreement before a new deadline is reached.

Emergency legislation barring any strike or lockout action before Mar. 1 provides that the President must report to Congress 15 days in advance of that date on progress toward a settlement and on any Administration proposals suggesting terms.

The emergency bill, passed by Congress after the walkout started, also provides that the carriers must put into effect immediately a temporary pay increase of 13.5 percent for rail employes, who have been waiting approximately 18 months for a raise.

The walkout began Dec. 10, the first day the workers and their unions had been free to strike since Pres. Nixon secured a Taft-Hartley no-strike injunction. Another restraining order was issued by a District of Columbia federal judge, and the strike ended after a day of picketing by members of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Until that point, the lines had been observed by members of the other three unions involved in the wage movement—the United Transportation Union, the Maintenance of Way Employes and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, representing diner crews.

Congress Approves National Job Safety Law

must be close scrutiny, constant policing and prompt and adequate enforcement" in order to accomplish the purposes of the legislation.

"We intend that this machinery, which we have sought for so long, be used fully, effectively and without delay in order to alleviate the horrible toll of suffering and death in America's workplaces," Meany declared.

Labor's all-out campaign for an effective federal job safety and health law stemmed from mounting evidence that neither voluntary action by industry nor the weak and inadequate state programs have been effective. Each year some 14,500 workers are killed on the job and 2.5 million suffer disabling injuries.

Equally important, researchers are only now beginning to uncover the toll of industrial diseases, and new chemicals and materials constantly pose unanswered questions regarding hazards. The legislation would establish new federal research programs in the health and safety fields.

A House-Senate conference committee closely followed the stronger Senate version of the bill and House Republican conferees first indicated they would urge the House to vote down the conference bill.

Business lobbyists, outspoken in their disappointment of the measure, set out to round up votes against final passage.

But most of the GOP members fell in line after Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson sent word that the Administration would accept the bill and the President would sign it into law.

Hodgson, in a letter to the senior Republican members of the conference committee, termed the final version a "constructive compromise . . . which I am proud to support."

He said he was "enthusiastic" about the independent review commission and considers the legislation as a whole "a significant achievement."

The letter had quick effect. Rep. William A. Steiger (R-Wis.), who had said after the conference agreement that he would urge the House to kill the legislation, issued a statement the next morning that the bill is "effective and fair" and "worthy of support."

The legislation does not take effect until 120 days after the President signs it—about the end of April.

Initially the Secretary of Labor will put into effect relatively non-controversial "consensus" standards that various industry groups and standard-setting organizations have adopted.

More comprehensive and presumably stronger standards will be drawn up with the help of advisory boards—but with the final decision to be made by the Secretary of Labor.

The bill establishes a new post of Assistant Secretary of Labor for Health & Safety and Labor Dept. inspectors will be responsible for checking workplaces for violations.

Union representatives are specifically authorized to accompany the inspector on his rounds.

In the original legislation, the Labor Dept. could have ordered the emergency shutdown of a plant or an operation if it posed a threat of serious injury or death. The final bill, however, requires the department to obtain a court order before it can require a shutdown.

An employer challenging a Labor Dept. citation ordering correction of an occupational hazard can appeal first to the independent review commission. The losing party there also has the right to seek a further court review.

The secretary and the courts will be able to impose various civil penalties, such as fines. But the only criminal action permitted against an employer would be for a willful violation that results in death.

Pres. Johnson proposed health-safety legislation in 1968, but up until this year no bill had reached a vote in either the Senate or House.

Led by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, employers mounted a massive scare campaign with wild-eyed predictions of companies being forced to shut down by dictatorial government inspectors.

But when the Nixon Administration proposed a cumbersome series of independent boards as part of a weak safety bill, the employer groups lined up behind efforts to substitute it for the labor-supported legislation introduced by two New Jersey Democrats—Sen. Harrison A. Williams Jr., and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels.

The Senate stuck fairly closely to the Williams bill, with the major change adoption of the independent review panel through an amendment by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.). But the House substituted an employer-backed "compromise" for the Daniels bill. The AFL-CIO termed the result "an administrative monstrosity" and far inferior to the Senate version.

Agreement Reached

Four Postal Unions To Act on Merger

Presidents of four AFL-CIO postal unions have signed a merger agreement, subject to ratification by their members.

The agreement was announced at the headquarters of the Postal Clerks, largest of the participating unions, and was described as "the first major step toward one big postal union."

Union presidents signing the pact were Francis S. Filbey for the Postal Clerks, Monroe Crable for the Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes, Chester W. Parrish for the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes and Michael J. Cullen of the Special Delivery Messengers.

The Postal Clerks have 175,000 members and the merger would bring the membership of the combined union over the 200,000 mark.

There remained a possibility that the largest unaffiliated postal organization, the National Postal Union, would join in a merger agreement.

Filbey and NPU Pres. David Silvergleid announced that a three-day meeting of merger committees of the two unions had resulted in "substantial agreement." A further meeting has been scheduled for early January to continue discussions on several unresolved issues.

The unions which have reached agreement on a merger plan all hold national exclusive bargaining rights for their crafts in the U.S. Postal Service and the merger agreement will protect the craft identity of the participating organizations.

The four unions, along with the Letter Carriers, Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, have been cooperating in collective bargaining as part of the recently-established Council of American Postal Employes (CAPE).

While set up to present a united bargaining front, CAPE has endorsed as a "pressing aim" the "total merger of all postal employes into one big postal union."

Postal Council Picks Cushman As Spokesman

Bernard Cushman, a Washington lawyer with extensive experience in labor relations and arbitration, has been named chief spokesman for the Council of American Postal Employes in its forthcoming negotiations with the U.S. Postal Service.

The council consists of seven major postal unions holding exclusive national recognition for bargaining with the Postal Service. Sessions are scheduled to begin next Jan. 20.

Cushman has worked with the Labor Bureau of the Middle West, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and has served as general counsel for the Amalgamated Transit Union.

He is associated with the newly merged Washington law firm of Bredhoff, Barr, Gottesman, Cohn & Peer. Partners in the firm represent a number of labor unions and labor agencies.

Veto of Manpower Bill Branded 'Outrageous'

The measure would have authorized $9.5 billion over nearly four years, including $200 million in the current fiscal year for the public service jobs program.

Nixon particularlly objected to this section of the measure, claiming that much of the spending would eventually go for what he termed "dead-end" jobs.

Meany charged that the President's veto statement misrepresented the bill's language and intent.

"Despite the President's rationalization," Meany asserted, "the fact is that the bill would have created useful jobs needed by the community — not dead-end, make-work jobs."

The veto is a direct rejection of a constructive form of sharing federal revenues with the hard pressed states and local governments, especially the cities, Meany stressed.

"The President has moved the cities closer to fiscal disaster, dashed the hopes of millions who have looked to public service employment as a way off welfare roles, and has insured that the unemployment rate will continue to climb unchecked," he said.

The legislation would also have consolidated in the Labor Dept. manpower training programs now spread among various departments and would have met the White House goal of giving local and state governments greater control over administration of the programs.

Only hours before the veto was announced, White House Press Sec. Ronald Ziegler—asked whether the President would sign the bill—said, "Yes, I believe he will sign it this week."

The U.S. Conference of Mayors issued a strong protest over the veto. The mayors of major cities are "horrified" that the President rejected the measure "without so much as even hearing from the mayors who are so vitally concerned with this critical legislation," said John J. Gunther, executive director of the conference.

Gunther noted that the mayors of the nation's 15 largest cities had been trying desperately to meet with Nixon on the legislation ever since Congress passed it, but were "brushed aside" by the President.

Under the public service jobs section, the bill would have enabled local and state governments and such non-profit institutions as community hospitals to hire unemployed workers for needed services with the federal government paying 80 percent of the payroll costs.

In addition to the $200 million authorized in the current fiscal year for the public service jobs program, the legislation would have allowed appropriations of $400 million next year, $600 million in Fiscal 1973 and $800 million in Fiscal 1974.

"splendid agreement" which includes clear and explicit back-to-work language. He congratulated BRAC members on Northwest "for the unity, courage and persistence."

Members of the Machinists and Transport Workers supported the strike by refusing to cross BRAC picket lines for the full duration of the walkout. Many members of the Air Line Pilots were laid off, and a management spokesman said it may take 120 days or more to complete the requalification and retraining for more than 1,200 pilots idled by the strike.

BRAC maintained picket lines in all the 38 domestic cities normally served by Northwest, including the line's headquarters here.

During negotiations management made only one wage offer.

Efforts to get contract talks resumed were made Sept. 18 by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the presidents of all affected unions—Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists, Charles Ruby of the Pilots and Robert E. Commerce of the Air Line Dispatchers.

They called on Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson to intervene in order to achieve "good faith collective bargaining" by the line's management. Usery was assigned and called the parties to Washington.

Meanwhile the carrier laid off 75 percent of its employes, maintained service on less than 25 percent of its schedule, and collected funds under the 10-company mutual aid pact in the airlines industry.

Senate Trade Bill Called Urgent To Prevent Further Job Erosion

The trade bill awaiting action in the Senate is urgently needed to "prevent further erosion of U.S. jobs and the dismantling of our productive capacity," the AFL-CIO declared.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller spelled out labor's position on trade legislation in letter to all senators warning that "the problems next year will be far more acute if no action is taken in this Congress."

While critical of the House-passed trade bill, the AFL-CIO has termed the revised version drawn up by the Senate Finance Committee "a step forward" and, despite flaws, "a necessary bill."

Historically, Biemiller noted, the AFL-CIO has staunchly supported freer trade.

But he stressed that "the world has changed so dramatically that what is defended as 'free trade' is to a great degree no longer free nor trade."

A new approach is needed "to save the livelihoods and purchasing power of America's millions of working families."

The Senate bill is "pro-worker, not anti-consumer," Biemiller declared.

"Some 700,000 U.S. workers have lost jobs between 1966 and 1969 due to imports—and that figure is rising sharply," he warned. "Thus as consumers their purchasing power has been wiped out, their tax payments have halted, and many of them have been forced onto public assistance—all at increased cost to other Americans."

The AFL-CIO supports quotas on textile apparel and footwear, Biemiller wrote senators.

He defended the quotas in the Senate bill as "a stop-gap measure which will allow continued heavy imports of these items while at the same time seeking to stabilize industries and jobs that are threatened with suffocation."

Contrary to claims made by critics, there is no reduction of trade. "Imports can actually rise. There is no rollback or high tariff wall against imports."

He urged senators to oppose any amendments that would include a provision of the House-passed bill establishing tax windfalls to businesses through a new Domestic International Sales Corporation. (DISC).

Such a device, Biemiller said, "will not lead to expanded exports but to an expansion of a tax loophole and a $1 billion yearly loss in treasury funds that will have to be made up by working Americans."

The AFL-CIO also opposed a House provision which would cut tariffs on chemicals, and "result in the loss of thousands of American jobs."

Labor-supported provisions of the Senate bill include a more realistic requirement for Tariff Commission action to assist industries and workers "acutely or severely injured" by rising imports.

Because of inadequacies of present law, the federation noted, "U.S. production of radios, non-electric typewriters, black and white television sets, sewing machines, and many other sophisticated manufacturing processes have been almost wiped out."

The AFL-CIO does not believe that action to protect U.S. jobs from further erosion will bring about a trade war or retaliation against U.S. exports, the letter said.

"The entire world is wise enough to know that they want the U.S. markets," the letter declared. "They know that the U.S. has problems today. Japan and the Common Market have full employment; yet we have a jobless rate of almost 6 percent nationally."

Despite various imperfections, the federation said, the Senate bill is a "beginning" in the direction of a greatly needed "new international trade concept."

Marland Cleared For Education Post

Sidney P. Marland, Jr., was confirmed by the Senate as U.S. Commissioner of Education on Dec. 10. The nomination had been cleared by the Senate Labor Committee the previous day after three days of hearings.

The AFL-CIO issued a statement expressing disappointment with the Senate's haste in confirming Marland. The statement also said that the position of Commissioner of Education "requires a much more searching inquiry than the Senate's pro forma treatment."

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller had presented testimony before the Senate committee opposing the nomination on the basis of Marland's record of opposition to collective bargaining rights for teachers and the potential conflicts of interest posed by his links to businesses dealing in education.

Support Urged For Chemical Union Strikers

Chemical workers on strike since June against the Sterling Drug Co. deserve and "should have the complete support of the united labor movement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in letters to union presidents and officers of central labor bodies.

Some 2,000 members of the International Chemical Workers Union are striking company plants in Cincinnati and Rensselaer, O., over contract proposals which the company has "adamantly rejected."

Meany wrote that the union is seeking wage and working conditions that are generally applicable in the industry. Its demands are legitimate and involve basic trade union issues, he said in reporting that area AFL-CIO unions are respecting the ICWU's picket lines.

Meany urged AFL-CIO affiliates to "lend whatever assistance you can to the ICWU in order to achieve a satisfactory settlement."

New Housing Bill Sent to White House

Congress voted final approval to a labor-supported housing bill that would inaugurate important new programs as well as raise the spending ceiling on continuing federal aid to housing.

A conservative coalition in the House tried unsuccessfully to kill the legislation, which includes an innovative program of federal planning and financial assistance for economically balanced "new communities" in metropolitan areas.

The provision was included in the Senate-passed bill but not in the House-passed version. Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford and his conservative southern allies charged that the House conferees had "capitulated" to the Senate without fighting hard enough for the bobtailed House bill.

The House rejected the charge and approved the conference commitee report by a 168-104 vote. It had already been approved by the Senate with strong bipartisan support and no recorded opposition.

The Nixon Administration had opposed any new legislation and had asked Congress merely to vote a six-month extension of existing programs that otherwise would expire.

Earlier this year, the Administration reportedly was planning to propose a version of the new communities program. But it retreated to a "do-nothing" position rather than support a broader program drawn up by congressional Democrats.

The bill sent to the White House would authorize $2.9 billion for housing and urban renewal programs through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972.

It includes a new program that would permit organizations of farm workers and other nonprofit groups to receive loans and grants to build permanent housing for migrant workers—in contrast to the jerry-built shacks frequently provided by farm employers.

Also in the bill is authority for construction of so-called "dormitory" housing for low income elderly, displaced and handicapped single

Court Ruling Spurs Bids for Youth Vote

By David L. Perlman

Massive register-and-vote campaigns—aimed at enrolling millions of newly-enfranchised young Americans—may determine the outcome of the 1972 presidential and congressional elections.

A 5-4 majority of the Supreme Court ruled that Congress acted within its constitutional powers when it passed a law allowing 18-year-olds to vote in elections to fill federal offices.

That will make potential voters of some 11.5 million Americans who will be 18, 19 or 20 at the time of the next nationwide elections. And it will make potential winners of the candidates, parties and political action groups most successful in bringing new voters to the registration offices—and to the polls.

The court also upheld—by an 8-1 majority—a section of the law prohibiting a state from requiring more than a 30-day residence period to vote for President. That provision alone could add at least 5 million more voters, persons who move too close to Election Day to meet the established residence requirements in their state.

And by a unanimous vote, the court approved a nationwide ban

Meany Condemns Franco On Tyranny of Regime

The Franco dictatorship's current wave of brutal attacks against its opponents was condemned by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he urged the U.S. government "to bring to bear full diplomatic and economic pressure on the Spanish tyrannical regime to end its barbarism."

Meany said that no matter what disagreement one may have with "certain aims and tactics of any Basque faction, all must condemn the Franco dictatorship's inhuman treatment of workers, peasants, intellectuals and religious leaders opposing the Falangist dictatorship.

"In this spirit, we also urge free trade unions everywhere to consider joint action for an effective, worldwide economic boycott with a view of assisting democratic forces inside Spain."

Those forces, Meany said, are fighting courageously to replace the totalitarian Franco regime with a truly democratic government that will enable the Spanish people "to take their rightful place in the front ranks of the free nations."

Congress Sets Final Session After Holiday

A deadlocked Congress will return from a Christmas week recess to make a final effort to untangle a package of major legislation before adjournment.

The general expectation was that most of the controversial bills tied up in a series of Senate filibusters would be scrapped, and would have to begin the legislative course anew when the 92nd Congress convenes in January.

Trade legislation, a family assistance welfare reform bill, and a plan for social security "catastrophic" medical insurance were among the likely discards.

In the uncertain category was a Dept. of Transportation appropriations bill that includes compromise funding for another year of development of a supersonic transport plane. Two attempts to limit debate and break a filibuster against the bill fell far short of the required two-thirds majority.

A new controversy surfaced just before the Christmas recess as a conservative-dominated House-Senate conference committee agreed on an emasculated food stamp bill.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), author of a vastly superior bill that passed the Senate last year by a big

Labor Dept. Budgets Rise 6% in Year

By John R. Oravec

A typical city family of four needed an annual income of $10,664 last spring to maintain a moderate standard of living—about $600 more than in the spring of 1969, the Labor Dept. estimates.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the cost of "lower level" and "higher level" family budgets also increased about 6 percent over the year.

For the much tighter "lower level" budget, which the BLS in the past described as "austere," a worker with three dependents living in an urban area needed $6,960 in annual income compared with $6,567 a year earlier.

The "higher level" budget—still a long way from luxury living—required $15,511 a year for an urban couple with two children, up from $14,589 in the spring of 1969.

Today, the family budget at all three levels would be even higher because living costs have climbed about 3 percent since last spring. This would put the lower level

'71 Bargaining Includes Pacts For 5 Million

Major union contracts covering nearly 5 million workers will be up for renegotiation or reopening in 1971 to make it another heavy year for collective bargaining, the Labor Dept. reported.

A survey by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that besides the major contracts—those covering workers in groups of 1,000 or more—agreements affecting several million additional workers in smaller units also will come up for renewal during the year.

The BLS report made two other points:

- In 1971 some 5.3 million workers under unexpired major

Labor School Explores Key Issues in South

Wrightsville, N.C. — Fifty-three participants in the Advanced Southern Labor School here focused on key issues affecting workers and unions in the South.

Economics, labor relations, analysis of the 1970 election results and labor programs to aid the disadvantaged were among the areas covered in the week-long program. Participants included fulltime officers of 10 southern AFL-CIO state bodies, international unions and AFL-CIO staff members.

Highlighting the sessions were:

- An analysis by AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger of economic problems facing workers in the South.
- A report by Director Robert M. McGlotten of the Human Resources Development Institute on the HRDI's role in Apprenticeship Outreach and other worker-assistance programs.
- A report on labor relations developments under the Nixon Administration by James Youngdahl, a labor lawyer from Little Rock.
- A review of the 1970 election results by COPE Area Directors Dan Powell and Clement Dowler.

Rep. Bob Eckhardt (D-Tex.) also presented the findings of a survey that contradicted Vice Pres. Agnew's charges that newspapers are anti-Republican and pro-liberal. Eckhardt's study showed that the press generally has supported Republican candidates for election.

Non-Union Wage Gains Trail Contract Boosts

The Commerce Dept. predicts that the 1970 median wage increase for all unionized manufacturing employes will run between 6 percent and 6.5 percent—a full 2.5 percentage points higher than the median wage gains for nonunion factory workers.

The main reason for the difference, the department's Office of Business Economics said, is that wage increases for nonunion employes are "more subject to management discretion."

The Commerce Dept. estimated that increases in straight-time pay for nonunion factory workers will be between 3.5 percent and 4 percent, down from about 5 percent in 1969.

Included in these averages are manufacturing workers who have to take a pay cut or go without a raise as well as those who get wage increases.

Textile Study Confirms 'Brown Lung' Hazard

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America is stepping up its campaign to protect its members from byssinosis, or "brown lung" disease, on the basis of a recently released study confirming that byssinosis is a major health hazard of the textile industry.

Brown lung is a disease that results in shortness of breath, chest tightness and chronic coughing. More than 819,000 workers each year are exposed to the industrial hazards causing the disease.

Chief among these hazards is the cotton dust of the textile industry, according to tests made by New York's Mt. Sinai School of Medicine during the TWUA convention last June.

The study showed that 23 percent of the participants who have worked in cotton processing had symptoms of respiratory disease, while only 6 percent of those who were not so exposed had the same symptoms.

Moreover, a higher proportion of those currently working in cotton mills exhibited the symptoms than those who had worked with cotton some time in the past.

The Mt. Sinai tests among 359 persons at the convention also showed that:

- Cotton workers represented 82 percent of those found to have respiratory symptoms, although they were only 56 percent of those tested.
- Twenty-seven percent of male cotton workers showed respiratory symptoms, compared to 16 percent of the female workers. This may result from the fact that men are employed in processes that produce more cotton dust than the processes in which women work, the report suggested.
- About four out of five cotton workers suffering from respiratory symptons were employed in cotton mills at the time of the study.
- Of a total of 359 persons examined, 57 showed respiratory disease symptoms. Forty-seven of the 57 were cotton workers, five worked with other fibers, four worked with plastics and one held another type of job.

"This is additional confirmation of the fact that byssinosis is a serious hazard faced by cotton mill workers," said TWUA President William Pollock.

Pollock said the union's determination to remove the brown lung hazard from the cotton mill "contrasts vividly with the do-nothing attitude of the cotton textile industry.

"The industry a year ago announced the hiring of the Industrial Hygiene Foundation, Inc. . . . to work on the problem. The foundation has still not made public any findings.

"Also, the industry has yet to join with us in pushing for passage of the Burton bill, which would establish a program of federal compensation for byssinosis sufferers," Pollock said.

Pacts Covering 5 Million To Be Negotiated in '71

agreements are due to receive deferred wage increases averaging 7.8 percent as a result of prior negotiations.

- Increasing numbers of workers are being protected by contract clauses that assure wage boosts keyed to rises in the cost of living.

The report made public the BLS calendar of deferred wage increases and major negotiations for 1971, to appear in the January 1971 issue of the Monthly Labor Review.

Industries in which major union contracts expire next year, according to the BLS calendar include telephone, with 538,000 workers covered; construction, 532,000; steel, 400,000; aerospace, 212,000; gas and electric utilities, 137,000; men's clothing, 125,000; glass container, 92,000; bituminous coal, 80,000; stevedoring, 73,000; aluminum manufacturing, 44,500; and cans, 38,000.

In addition, four unions representing 400,000 railroad workers will resume bargaining after the first of the year in a dispute over wages and work rules that started more than a year ago. Congress ordered a first-step wage increase of 13.5 percent into effect in a law that extended a ban on strikes or lockouts to Mar. 1. The unions involved are the Railway Clerks, United Transportation Union, Maintenance of Way Employes and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes representing dining car workers.

The report on deferred increases said wage boosts negotiated in recent years will go into effect in 1971 in such major industries as apparel, automobile and electrical equipment.

The average increase for 2.7 million workers in manufacturing will be 4.9 percent, or 18.1 cents an hour. Largely because of increases in the construction and trucking industries, wage hikes for 2.6 million workers in non-manufacturing will be higher—10.8 percent, or 58.4 cents an hour, the BLS report said.

The bureau noted that 1970 settlements produced new cost-of-living escalator clauses in 23 major bargaining situations. This brings to about 3 million the number of workers covered by contracts providing automatic adjustment of wage rates because of changes in the level of prices, as measured by the Labor Dept. in its Consumer Price Index.

persons. Occupants would have the privacy of single rooms but would share common kitchen and other tenant facilities.

To meet the problem of businesses in inner-city areas that have been unable to obtain reasonably-priced insurance against theft, burglary and vandalism, the federal government would be authorized to provide direct insurance starting next August.

On continuing programs, the bill authorizes an additional $1.5 billion for urban renewal and another $200 million for model cities grants for the 1972 fiscal year. The actual money, however, must be appropriated in separate legislation.

The measure raises the spending authority for public housing and earmarks $75 million of new money for operating and maintenance expenses. The intent is to halt the deterioration of services and maintenance in public housing projects which have been squeezed by the combination of higher maintenance costs and the limit on rents that can be charged.

Deleted from the final version of the bill, however, was a Senate provision that would have authorized $750 million in federal grants to help pay deficits of mass transit operations.

at about $7,168, the intermediate level at $10,893, and the higher level at $15,976.

But even at the lowest of the three levels of living standards the average production worker would be in the "red."

A recent BLS report showed that in November average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers amounted to $121.07. If a rank-and-file employe earning this average put in a full 52 weeks on the job, his total annual income would come to $6,295.64—more than $600 below the lower level budget set for last spring and nearly $900 short of what that budget would cost today.

The budget figures cited are averages for the entire country. Actually, costs varied significantly from city to city, higher in the big metropolitan areas and substantially greater in Alaska and Hawaii. (Table below.)

The BLS budget estimates are based on a family made up of a 38-year-old husband working full-time, a non-working wife, a son of 13 and a daughter of 8.

This is how the intermediate level budget would be apportioned over the year: food $2,452, housing $2,501, transportation $912, clothing and personal care $1,137, medical care $564, other family consumption $639, other costs $539, social security and disability insurance $387, and personal income taxes $1,533.

Cost of the lower level budget would be broken down as follows: food $1,905, housing $1,429, transportation $505, clothing and personal care $807, medical care $562, other family consumption $345, other costs $343, social security and disability insurance $345, and personal income taxes $719.

Spending of the higher level budget would go for: food $3,092, housing $3,772, transportation $1,183, clothing and personal care $1,655, medical care $588, other family consumption $1,056, other costs $903, social security and disability insurance $387, and personal income taxes $2,875.

The BLS noted that the cost of all food—eaten at home and away from home—accounted for 34 percent of the lower budget, 30 percent of the intermediate budget and 27 percent at the higher level.

And while medical care costs took 10 percent of the lower level budget, they accounted only for 7 percent at the intermediate level and 5 percent at the higher level.

Spending for shelter at the lower level—based on a rented dwelling unit—was 26 percent of all consumption costs. This was below the portion spent on housing in the intermediate and higher level budgets, which are based mainly on home ownership and upkeep costs. The intermediate budget allotted 33 percent for housing and the higher level budget 34 percent.

Consumption costs in metropolitan areas were about 8 percent higher than in nonmetropolitan urban areas for the lower budget, the BLS reported.

The metropolitan-nonmetropolitan difference was 13 percent more for the intermediate budget and 17 percent more for the higher level.

Total budget costs were lowest in the South, the BLS noted, where small cities had the lowest indexes at all three levels.

Consumption costs for each of the budget levels have increased 14 percent since spring 1967 when the BLS first published the family budget studies.

For Federal Employes:

Congress Adds Step To Blue-Collar Pay

Legislation to provide an extra pay step for 600,000 blue-collar federal employes and a bill granting early retirement benefits to 11,000 fire fighters at government installations won final congressional approval before the Christmas recess.

Both bills were strongly supported by labor—and opposed as too costly by the Administration.

The blue-collar pay bill, trimmed down in conference from a House-passed version in an effort to avoid a threatened veto, would give long-service workers a 4 percent pay hike.

Under the wage board system of prevailing area pay scales, the government's blue-collar workers start at 4 percent below the going rate. After 26 weeks, they move up to the prevailing wage, and 78 weeks later advance to 4 percent above the going scale.

The new legislation would give them an additional 4 percent step two years later, bringing them to 108 percent of the base rate.

The bill also provides for the first time a form of wage board pay-setting for about 140,000 workers who have what amounts to second-class status as government employes. They are employed by military post exchanges and other self-financing activities, and are not paid from appropriated federal funds.

Despite opposition from the Republican leadership, the House approved final passage of the legislation by a one-sided 271-89 vote.

The fire fighter bill, which cleared the Senate earlier this year without opposition, won final House approval by a 158-104 vote in the face of a direct veto threat.

It would extend to fire fighters at government installations the same early retirement rights now given to federal law enforcement officers and other groups engaged in hazardous occupations.

Fire fighters with at least 20 years of service in hazardous assignments would be entitled to retire at age 50 with a full pension. This would be accomplished by computing their retirement benefits at a more favorable rate than that used to determine normal government pensions.

A letter from Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert E. Hampton, read to the House before the vote, warned that the commission is "very, strongly opposed" to the bill "and, if it is enacted, would recommend to the President that it be vetoed."

The legislation, nevertheless, had the unanimous endorsement of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee. It had been a longtime goal of the Fire Fighters and other unions representing government employes.

PRE-SCHOOL YOUNGSTERS turn out for a ceremony launching a day care center in New York City by the Laundry Workers Joint Board of the Clothing Workers. When completed, the center will have facilities for about 150 youngsters—half of them children of joint board members and the others from families in the community. Among the persons participating in the ceremony were ACWA Vice Presidents Howard Samuels, third from left, and Louis Simon, third from right, who is also the joint board manager.

Court Ruling Stands On NLRB Remedies

The Supreme Court refused to review an Appeals Court ruling that the National Labor Relations Board should consider a remedy that would "make whole" workers for wages and other benefits they were denied while their employer illegally refused to negotiate with their union.

The high court's action left standing an order by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that the Tiidee Products, Inc., which makes house trailer parts in Dayton, O., must bargain with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Last April the appeals court upheld the board's bargaining order. It also directed the NLRB to hold further hearings on the IUE's argument that the employer should not be allowed to profit from his refusal to bargain. Management appealed the decision.

Despite the Supreme Court action, an NLRB spokesman said the board probably will reiterate its position that Congress has not given it authority to order such a "make-whole" remedy.

The company's petition to the Supreme Court cited another bar—the high court's decision last year in the H. K. Porter Co. case, in which the board was told it could not order an employer to agree to a dues deduction clause.

The NLRB decided Aug. 29 in a 3-2 decision that it has no power to make employes whole for employer stalling on contracts. That case involved the Ex-Cell-O Corp., Elwood, Ind., and the Auto Workers.

Chairman Edward B. Miller and Members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., held that only an amendment by Congress could give the NLRB authority to compensate employes in such cases. Members Frank W. McCulloch and Gerald A. Brown dissented. They agreed with a trial examiner that Ex-Cell-O should have made its employes whole "for their measurable losses, if any. . . ."

Ex-Cell-O is now before the D.C. Court of Appeals on the NLRB's petition for an order directing the company to start bargaining now, pending a normal review of the facts.

Former Head Of Missouri AFL-CIO Dies

St. Louis—John I. Rollings, president emeritus of the Missouri AFL-CIO and a leading labor figure in the state for more than three decades, died of a heart attack after an illness of about a year. He was 65.

Rollings retired last Jan. 2 as state council president after serving in the post since 1956, and as head of the former Missouri State AFL since 1953. The state body's 1970 convention cited him for outstanding service through the years.

Born on a Missouri farm, Rollings became a barber at 20 and later held every major office in Barbers Local 102. He became president of the Missouri State Association of Barbers, was elected a delegate to several AFL conventions, and in 1942 won election as executive secretary of the St. Louis AFL, a post he held for 13 years.

Survivors include his wife Fannie, three sisters and eight brothers, all of Missouri.

Bessie Hillman, Clothing Union Pioneer, Dies

New York—Bessie Hillman, widow of union leader Sidney Hillman and a vice president of the Clothing Workers for nearly a quarter-century, died here after an illness of several weeks. She was 81.

She was "a true trade unionist, a real humanitarian and a fine lady," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message of sympathy to ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky. "We shall miss her." They also sent condolences to Mrs. Philoine Fried and Mrs. Selma Kraft, daughters of Mrs. Hillman, who they said had served her union and the trade union movement "with dedication and distinction."

Mrs. Hillman died here in St. Vincent's Hospital. She will be buried in Westchester Hills Cemetery after services at 10 a.m. Dec. 28 at the Free Synagogue, 30 W. 68th St., Manhattan.

Mrs. Hillman met her husband in Chicago in 1910, when she was a button sewer who led 16 girls in a walkout that led to the historic Hart, Shaffner & Marx strike. Sidney Hillman was a cutter who emerged from the strike as principal leader of a union that became the ACWA in 1914. They were married in 1916.

Upon marriage, Mrs. Hillman resigned from her paid job as a local union business agent for ACWA, but she continued as an unpaid agent. Her husband, first president of the ACWA, died in 1946 at 59. Since then she had worked tirelessly to spread the organizing and education message through schools and seminars.

Hyman Faine to Head Arts Program at UCLA

New York—The American Guild of Musical Artists announced that Hyman R. Faine, its executive secretary for 25 years, has resigned effective Dec. 31.

Faine will become professor of arts administration and director of a new arts administration program at the Graduate School of Business Administration, University of California, Los Angeles. He was on leave from AGMA from January to June 1970 to serve as regents' professor of arts administration at UCLA.

AGMA is an affiliate of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America, AFL-CIO.

New York Taxi Drivers Score Gains, End Strike

New York—The Taxi Drivers Union reached agreement with cab fleet owners on a new contract and members voted at an overflow meeting to end a 15-day strike.

The union, representing 36,000 drivers and 1,200 garagemen, won major improvements over the terms of an expired three-year contract, said Local Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, who also heads the New York City AFL-CIO.

Contract signing was postponed pending a vote of the city council on a fare increase ordinance recommended by Mayor John Lindsay.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who issued the charter to the union four years ago, asked Van Arsdale to "convey to your fellow officers and members my commendation on the successful outcome of negotiations" that brought the strike to an end.

Regional AFL-CIO Director Michael Mann called the walkout "one of the finest demonstrations of trade union solidarity in town." Mann said that from Dec. 5 to the settlement, "not a cab rolled, not a wrench was turned" in any garage of the 69 fleets involved in negotiations.

Length of the agreement will be settled in mediation to be conducted by Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the New York State Mediation Board. Future commissions of drivers are keyed to the fare structure, with pension improvements subject to actuarial studies and approval of the pension fund trustees.

The negotiators agreed that retirement benefits will be raised from the current $75 a month to $100, then to $125 if actuarially practical, Mann reported.

Other gains listed by the union include a hiring hall, installation of bullet-resistant partitions in cabs, two-way radios, heat in waiting rooms, prompt payment of vacation pay and dues checkoff through the drivers' credit union.

Firm Ordered to Supply Information on Retirees

The National Labor Relations Board ordered the Union Carbide Corp. to furnish the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers with collective bargaining information about retirees whether or not they are considered employes within the union's bargaining jurisdiction.

Union Carbide based its refusal to provide the information on a ruling of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Cincinnati that retirees and pensioners are no longer employes as defined by the Taft-Hartley law and that employers, therefore, are not legally bound to bargain on terms and conditions for them.

The appeals court decision, which could have an adverse affect on millions of American workers and those already in retirement, involved Local 1 of the Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers and the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. Chemical Division at Barberton, O.

The Labor Board, the AFL-CIO and individual unions filed briefs asking the Supreme Court to review and reverse the lower court's decision.

In the Union Carbide case, NLRB Trial Examiner John M. Dyer came to the conclusion that it really doesn't matter whether retired workers remain members of the bargaining unit under the law. He ruled that an employer is still obligated to furnish the union with information showing how the retirement plan has worked for those who have retired so the union can formulate recommendations for changes that will affect those retiring in the future.

The union, IUE Local 749, argued that it needed the information to bargain effectively, claiming that retired employes are part of the bargaining unit it represents at Union Carbide's Carbon Products Division at Fostoria, O.

The labor board, upholding the trial examiner, specifically ordered Union Carbide to supply the following information:

Number of retirees; amount of benefits each receives; years of service of each retiree; the number, identity and amount of payments to all persons receiving disability benefits, and the extent of disability for employes receiving such payments.

The Eternal Struggle

ON THIS CHRISTMAS of 1970 the struggle continues to establish peace and freedom on a lasting basis—a struggle that has continued without let-up since World War II.

It is as clear now as it was in 1945 that there is no alternative to peace in this age of missiles and satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

The free world has the resources, the manpower and the ability to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

IN ONE FORM or another the above theme has appeared in the Christmas or year-end editions of this paper since its first issue in December 1955. Yet this is not to despair; a quarter-century of mankind's survival, given the dire forecasts that came with the advent of the atomic bomb, is an achievement of consequence.

TRB, the highly regarded columnist for The New Republic, puts it this way: "Sometimes a climber pauses on a ledge and looks up and feels that the height is almost unscalable. But then looking down his heart leaps at the sight of how far he has come."

At Christmas time, at the end of another calendar year, it is proper and necessary to focus again on the eternal question of peace and goodwill and the revived hopes for new achievements in man's quest for justice and freedom.

But while we must consider how far we must still go, we should consider how far we have come and take pride in what we have done.

For American workers and the trade union movement 1970 was a year of achievements coupled with uncertainty and anxiety. The farm workers won their long struggle for union recognition. For postal workers it was the year collective bargaining was won for the first time by anyone in the federal service.

For thousands of GE workers 1970 meant the end of Boulwarism, the fruit of a long but successful strike.

But the year was marred by the state of the economy, which found the average worker caught in a squeeze between rising prices and rising unemployment and still a long way from "affluence."

THE YEAR 1970 marked also the 15th anniversary of the merger of the AFL and CIO, a merger whose deep and permanent roots in the needs and problems and hopes and aspirations of the American worker has given it great and continuing strength, a supple and flexible strength of a vital and alert organization.

The prophets of doom who had written off the trade union movement and the AFL-CIO years ago are strangely quiet, or are now concerned that labor may be "too powerful" in the coming years.

Only one thing is clear: There is a 15-year record of dedication to improving the life of America's workers as well as all Americans, a record that is a foundation stone for progress in the struggle for peace and justice and freedom.

Doing Your Own Thing Leaves Society's Dishes in the Sink

By John P. Roche

IT IS PROBABLY high treason for a teacher to say it, but there are times when I am convinced that, in any formal, structured sense, the most important things about life are unteachable. For almost a quarter of a century now I have been engaged in trying to communicate the experience of Western man to eager, bright young people. The history of political theory is actually a series of answers to the completely contemporary and relevant question: "What is a community?"

There is indeed a sense in which one could argue that the dispute between the New Left at one end of our political spectrum and the "law and order" zealots at the other is nothing more than a continuation of the battle between the 18th Century French philosopher, Jean Jacques Rosseau, and the 17th Century Englishman, Thomas Hobbes.

But just as every generation (including my own) persists in believing that sex was invented when it hit puberty, every generation seems compelled to re-invent the wheel. For example, there has been a great flurry about a book by a Yale law professor, Charles Reich, "The Greening of America." It is essentially cultural variations on a theme by Ken Galbraith (as the latter rushed to point out) and suggests that the salvation of America lies in the hands of an aristocratic elite.

This group, which has been to the best prep schools, colleges and law schools, has the capability of leading Americans away from the sordid atmosphere of materialism into a free-wheeling utopia where everyone will "do his own thing." While in Friedrich Engels' version of human liberation it is the task of the proletariat to lead mankind from "the realm of necessity to the realm of freedom," Reich assigns the task to pot-smokers with love beads and apparently inherited income—this is really a credit card utopia.

There is nothing particularly new about this gospel of liberation, except the notion that it can be somehow universalized in society. Indeed, the picture Reich paints resembles nothing more than a gathering of degenerate British milords and miladies during the Restoration (1660-1689) period, or later in the Regency era. They had great fun—drugs, sex, and the whole bit, including "black" masses, astrology, necromancy, and pornographic revels. God, did they transcend bourgeois materialism! But they never encouraged it in the masses. I suppose Reich is distinctively American in suggesting equal rights for all.

THIS IS NOT the time or place to argue the merits of Reich's thesis. The point is that this particular utopian scheme has been batting about for centuries under different auspices (those interested in the topic should read Norman Cohn's superb study, "The Pursuit of the Millennium" and a whole literature has accumulated on the subject. Throughout history there have been characters who claimed that communities could be established around the principle of "doing your own thing." And massive counter attacks were launched by such different types as St. Augustine and Thomas Hobbes. St. Paul's epistles to the Christians in Corinth, Ephesus, and elsewhere contain, when read in the proper context, ferocious attacks on Reich's "Consciousness III."

The task of a teacher is not to carry St. Paul's gospel, but to acquaint the young with the fact for more than 2,000 years Western society has been wrestling with the question of whether a community can exist without repression.

Yet, to return to the original theme, every generation apparently has to learn for itself. A former student of mine, full of love and enthusiasm, went off last year to a commune. A day or so back he turned up—haircut, necktie, no beads—and I naturally expressed some surprise.

"The dishes," he said. "No matter how much we rapped about it, nobody would wash the goddamned dishes!" I said nothing, but was reminded of Jose Ortega y Gasset's definition of barbarism: "Barbarism is the absence of standards to which appeal can be made."

But then, who reads Ortega as an authority on dishwashing?

Nixon 'Discovers' Health Care

The following is excerpted from an article in the Dec. 17, 1970, issue of the Washington Star, titled "Washington Close-up: Nixon's Tardy Health Program," by Judith Randal.

WHY—when no one at the televised news conference asked him specifically about the issue—did Pres. Nixon single out health as "one of the highest priority programs" he will submit to Congress next year?

The answer is that, while the White House has ignored the matter for 18 months (ever since the President said in July 1969 that he foresaw a "massive crisis"), the legislators whom it would now bend to its will have not. Accordingly, the Administration is in the uncomfortable position of being a late added starter in an already crowded race eager to make up for lost time.

It is apparent, for example, that an insurance proposal for the coverage of the expense of catastrophic illness sponsored by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) is the same in principle, if not in detail, as a plan the Administration is mulling over. Long's bill has little chance of passage before the 91st Congress ends this month, but it will likely be reintroduced by Long in the 92nd Congress, thus casting the President in a "me-too" role.

There is, furthermore, a fundamental difficulty with both proposals which their Republican and Democratic advocates alike will be hard put to explain after their initial political popularity begins to wear off: The measures provide for federal payment of medical bills with no thought whatever of how to control costs, insure quality care or meet the additional demand for services they would create—three matters that already have evoked the nation's concern.

It might seem that this lesson had been learned from Medicare, but apparently it has not, for there is nothing in either the $2.5 billion Long bill or anything the Administration has said that would indicate more than lip-service interest in measures to augment the supply of health manpower or tend to make the health care system more efficient.

Indeed, to cite just one example, the number of medical students receiving federal loans has dropped by more than 8,000 since the President took office, which hardly bodes well for the easing of the doctor shortage.

The irony of all this is that the Administration, after dragging its feet for nearly two years in the health care field, has resisted proposals—like that of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)—for comprehensive national health insurance, arguing that personnel and facilities for such a system are lacking.

As a matter of fact, the Kennedy proposal, which has bipartisan support, makes provisions for the expanded plant, equipment and personnel which national health insurance would require.

The Administration has opposed the measure on the ground, among others, that it is not in the American tradition. It would seem, however, that what Kennedy proposes could easily be justified as "research and development" which, if the space program and atomic energy are any indications, are as American as apple pie.

Meanwhile, the President is going to have to acknowledge, to himself at least, that he has an enormous credibility gap to close when he seeks to play the statesman in the health care field.

White House Numbers Game:

Whose Data Do You Believe?

The following is excerpted from an article in the Dec. 13, 1970, New York Times by Eileen Shanahan titled "Whose Economic Statistics Do You Believe?"

AS IF THE Nixon Administration were not having enough trouble with the economy, it has now embarked on a public relations policy that can only worsen its problems in this area—and the problems of all officials who will have to cope with the economy in the future.

In a nutshell, what the Nixon Administration has decided is that the basic economic statistics that are prepared in the various Government agencies, and the experts who prepare them, cannot be trusted to speak directly to the public. Not only has the Administration undertaken its own interpretations of some of the figures, but recently it has also come forth with some different figures of its own.

The result can only be, as it has been, confusion and, what is worse, the development of skepticism about the integrity of the basic statistics.

The experts at the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in explaining the increase in the unemployment rate in November, said that some of the worsening obviously could be attributed to layoffs in companies that were suppliers to the then strike-bound General Motors Corp., but that they could not estimate exactly how much. Nor would they estimate what the unemployment rate might have been without the GM strike.

No such humility prevailed at the White House, however, Pres. Nixon's press secretary, Ronald L. Ziegler, paraphrasing a memorandum supplied to him by the Council of Economic Advisers, said that the unemployment rate could have been as much as half a percentage point lower in November, without the strike, and implied that the rate would have fallen from the October level.

First of all, that implication was wrong, though it is perhaps easy enough to understand how someone such as Mr. Ziegler, not intimately familiar with the statistics, could honestly have misinterpreted the council's memo. The council did not claim that the unemployment rate would have declined in November without the strike.

Secondly, Mr. Ziegler's statement that the strike accounted for about one-half of 1 per cent of the 5.8 per cent November unemployment rate involved a "rounding up" of the figure. This added to the misrepresentation.

The council had actually estimated the effect at four-tenths of 1 per cent. Whether the error was Mr. Ziegler's cannot be established, since no one will permit publication of the council's memo. When questioned, the council states, however, that its actual estimate was four-tenths of 1 percent.

Of possibly more consequence than Mr. Ziegler's accidental, or purposeful, misrepresentations, however, is the very existence of unemployment figures prepared by the Council of Economic Advisers rather than by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, where the basic figures are assembled.

If Not Controlled:

Work Hazards Can Affect All

HEALTH HAZARDS workers face from chemicals and other substances in the plant can spill over into the community and endanger the public at large if they are not detected, understood and controlled, a union spokesman charged in a network radio interview.

"That chain link fence around the typical industrial plant is no insulator between the conditions in the plant and outside," declared Ray Davidson, editor of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Union News. He pointed out that although "workers are the guinea pigs of technological advancement" and the first to be exposed to the fumes and dusts of new chemicals, "those substances are eventually sent into the marketplace."

"There is an absolute and direct correlation between chemical health hazards in the industrial plants and in the marketplace, or in the air of the community, or in the water," he asserted. Davidson is also the author of "Peril on the Job," published by Public Affairs Press, a study of hazards in the chemical industry. He appeared on the AFL-CIO produced Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual network.

Davidson said that the states have "proven their inability to cope with" on-the-job health hazards, and that federal regulation and effective enforcement is the only way to shape meaningful protection for the health of workers.

He said a key goal of the OCAW's current contract bargaining in the oil industry is a health hazard research fund, created by a one-tenth-of-a-cent-per-barrel royalty, and jointly administered by the industry and the union. Research, he said, has to be the starting point in meeting the problem, but to date that effort has been "trivial," at best.

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR MANY YEARS there have been cries for states' rights but very few for state responsibilities.

The inter-relationship between states' rights and responsibilities was demonstrated recently under the provisions of the Wholesome Meat Act.

The 50 states were given three years to meet their responsibilities so that they could have their "rights" in meat inspection. Less than one-third of the states met the test.

This case history provides solid substance for those who believe that federal standards are essential today.

Pres. Johnson signed the Wholesome Meat Act into law on Dec. 15, 1967. It did not measure up to what consumer and labor groups sought—strong, effective meat inspection legislation to protect the entire American public.

The prime weakness in the bill was that it covered only meat in interstate and foreign commerce but did not originally cover meat slaughtered and processed solely within a single state. This was not a small part of the total industry—about 15 percent of all meat slaughtered in the nation and about 25 percent of all meat products were outside interstate and foreign commerce.

As a compromise to the state-federal issue, the Wholesome Meat Act exempted states from coverage for a period of two years. Then, if "the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe . . . that a state has not developed or is not enforcing . . . requirements that are at least equal to" the federal law, he can assume jurisdiction over the meat inspection of that state.

The Secretary of Agriculture was further authorized to cooperate with state agencies in any way that "would effectuate the purposes of this act."

This included furnishing assistance to the states in advisory manpower, equipment and manuals for instruction and even "financial and other aid for the administration of the program." In fact, the federal government could pay up to 50 percent of the cost of the state programs.

CONSUMER AND LABOR groups were not happy over this special treatment for the states, pointing out that it would not require the states to pass good inspection laws, strictly enforced and properly financed. And it would not protect the consumers against serious health hazards of bad meat among the billions of pounds which were uninspected or poorly inspected.

At the end of two years—on Dec. 15, 1969—only three states—Florida, Maryland and California—had brought their meat inspection programs "at least equal to" federal standards.

The Secretary of Agriculture then used his discretionary power and gave the other states an additional year to comply. Ten additional states were certified before Dec. 15, 1970: Alaska, Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Washington and Wyoming.

In North Dakota, the federal government moved in to supplant the state inspectors. The state challenged this in the courts and it took seven months before federal inspection was actually instituted. Agriculture Dept. officials hope that similar legal entanglements will not delay federal inspection in the other states.

James K. Payne, the federal-state coordinator under the program, said that 15 states have requested a review of their programs in the hope that they can avoid a federal takeover.

Other officials in the program, however, say that if these states had any meaningful plans to comply with the federal law they would have done it during the last three years. They say that while there is a possibility other states will comply, they doubt that many, if any, will.

So a major case for states' rights does not come off too well if only 13 of 50 states are willing to meet necessary minimum standards for the health of their people.

This drives home the argument that federal standards are essential in unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, in safety and in many other fields if all citizens are to receive the protections they need.

IN-PLANT HEALTH HAZARDS from chemicals and other substances can also pose a danger to the community at large, Ray Davidson, editor of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Union News, center, told Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference. The public affairs radio interview, produced by the AFL-CIO, is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual network.

1970 Proves Year of the 'Big Squeeze'

Jobless Rate, Living Costs Soar, Inflation Shrinks 'Real' Income

By Harry Conn

A new decade opened in 1970 but by the end of the year the problems, the issues and the challenges for American workers had not diminished.

In many areas they intensified, and for millions of workers, 1970 was the year of the "big squeeze."

Living costs soared higher and higher throughout the year and unemployment reached ominous levels as workers' collective bargaining gains rarely kept "real" wages from shrinking.

Organized labor fought back. At the beginning of the year a major strike against General Electric won landmark gains and at the end of the year, a successful strike against the giant General Motors Corp. set the pattern for new contracts in the auto industry.

Labor history was made as the grape workers, supported by an international boycott, won their long struggle for union recognition.

Politics dominated much of the year. Earlier, there was deep concern that a conservative tide would wipe out scores of labor's friends in public office. It didn't happen. The election produced a few disappointments, but all in all it was a good political year.

In May, tragedy hit the labor movement with the death of UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther in an airplane crash. He was succeeded by Leonard Woodcock who carried the union through difficult auto negotiations and the GM strike.

Following is a month-by-month review of the year from the files of Press Associates, Inc.

January

Prominent U.S. leaders form committee to aid families of General Electric strikers. . . . Nixon signs tax law and mine safety bill. . . . Meany scores Nixon for playing politics with Philadelphia Plan. . . . Chicago building trades, blacks support voluntary job plan. . . . Living-cost rise sharpest since 1951. . . . Nixon names G. ## Wage Parity Won in GM Canadian Pact

Oshawa, Ont.—Canadian members of the Auto Workers voted to end a three-month strike and accept a settlement that gives them wage parity with United States GM workers and partial parity in cost-of-living increments. Both were major aims of Canadian UAW locals with nearly 25,000 members.

The settlement was a compromise reached by UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock and GM Chairman James M. Roche. Accepted by the union's Canadian negotiators, it was ratified, 10,836 to 1,169. Many Quebec members were snowbound and could not vote.

The agreement, like the U.S. pact, removes the former ceiling on cost-of-living allowances and improves the escalator formula. The pension plan was improved considerably, the union said.

The new base rate for assemblers was raised 34 cents an hour this year to $4.12, rising to $4.51 an hour in 1972 plus any cost-of-living allowance over 13 cents.

margin, served notice that he would seek to block acceptance of the conference report.

Its final version provides a few needed improvements in the food stamp program. But it also uses a bare subsistence level of nutrition as a standard for a food budget and imposes a harsh "work or go hungry" mandate which would deprive an entire family of food stamps if any member able to work refused a job, regardless of how low the pay or how unsuitable the occupation.

Despite growing absenteeism that made it increasingly difficult to muster a quorum to do business, progress was made on some important legislation.

In addition to final passage of a labor-supported housing bill, Congress approved a bill setting strong curbs on air pollution by automobiles, factories and private residences.

Unless Congress itself voted to extend the deadline, auto manufacturers would have to come up with a virtually pollution-free engine within six years. The Nixon Administration had originally proposed a "goal" of 1980 for a pollution-free engine, but with no legal requirement that the goal be met.

Also awaiting final congressional action is a House-Senate conference agreement on legislation providing semi-automatic pay raises for salaried federal employes, based on comparability with private industry.

Alarmed by a warning from trustees of the bankrupt Penn Central Railroad that there will soon be no money in the till to operate trains, the House approved a government guarantee of loans to keep Penn Central and several smaller bankrupt lines functioning.

The Senate was scheduled to return from its Christmas recess Dec. 28, with the House coming back into session a day later.

Final adjournment is likely before the new year, and in any event the legal life of the 91st Congress expires on Jan. 3.

Members of the new 92nd Congress—most of them holdovers—still don't know when to report for work.

Under the Constitution, the new Congress would convene on Monday, Jan. 3—unless Congress sets another date by law.

Well, Congress did set another date—Jan. 21. But Pres. Nixon has threatened to require Congress to stick to the earlier date. He can do this by refusing to sign the Jan. 21 resolution.

The Senate spent several hours in a rare secret session in an effort to resolve some of the differences that have blocked action on legislation. But even though some of the opposing groups agreed to sit down and try to work out agreements, only a small portion of the logjam was unblocked.

Ironically, the new Senate is likely to begin its session with a filibuster.

At the start of each Congress, an effort is normally made to change the Senate rules in order to make it easier to vote an end to a filibuster.

But in past years, opponents of a rules change have filibustered in a successful maneuver to prevent a vote on a rules change.

Maritime Unions Cite Passenger Ship Crisis

The AFL-CIO Maritime Committee announced it intends to use congressional hearings as the focus of a "major push" to save U.S.-flag passenger ship operations. The committee noted that the last East Coast passenger service (Prudential-Grace Lines) is now scheduled to end in January.

The committee, headed by Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, called the decline of U.S. passenger ships a "national disgrace" and a "severe blow to our national economy, defense capacity and prestige."

The safety of passengers also is threatened, Curran charged because "there is not a single foreign-flag ship which is up to the standards of safety which our laws require of U.S.-flag ships."

Besides the NMU, unions represented on the committee include the Longshoremen, Marine Engineers, American Radio Association, the Masters, Mates & Pilots, and lakes seamen locals of the Steelworkers.

In another action, the NMU filed suit against four steamship lines, seeking $40 million as compensation for losses suffered by employes because of "illegal acts by the companies in connection with the layup of their passenger vessels." The suit also asks the court to require resumption of passenger ship operations by the companies.

The companies named in the suit were United States Lines, American Export Isbrandtsen, Moore-McCormack and Prudential-Grace Lines.

About 5,000 NMU seamen are affected.

The suit charges that the companies violated antitrust laws by forming "an unlawful combination or conspiracy to monopolize and restrain trade" in U.S.-flag shipping. It says the companies failed to notify the union properly of the planned layups, as required by contract.

RCA Hit On Plan to Export Jobs of 5,000

More than 5,000 RCA Corp. employes in Tennessee and Ohio will lose their jobs because the company is turning to cheap overseas labor markets, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers charged.

At the end of this month, RCA will close the doors of its Memphis, Tenn., plant on 1,600 who are employed in the manufacture of black and white television sets, antennas and other appliances, the IUE reported. By the end of next June, RCA will close its Cincinnati, O., plant, where 3,500 workers produce television tubes and solid state devices.

Many of the Cincinnati workers, members of IUE Local 771, have been with the plant since it opened 20 years ago. The Memphis workers are represented by IUE Local 730.

"This is a cruel blow to the thousands of workers affected," said IUE Pres. Paul Jennings in a letter to RCA Pres. Robert W. Sarnoff.

Jennings labeled as "ludicrous" the company's claim that foreign competition necessitated the move to cheap labor markets. He noted that RCA has more than 100 patent licensing agreements with Japanese firms. This allows the Japanese companies to manufacture RCA-developed consumer electronic goods by paying a royalty.

"It is a case of increased profits for the corporations and loss of jobs for employes," Jennings declared.

Federal Court Upholds Welfare Aid to Strikers

Boston—A decision by the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has thwarted an apparent attempt by two Massachusetts employers to wage starvation warfare against striking workers.

The court rejected a suit asking that the state's Dept. of Public Welfare be enjoined from paying welfare benefits to strikers otherwise eligible for public assistance under Massachusetts welfare laws.

The suits were brought separately by the ITT Lamp Division of International Telephone & Telegraph Corp., and by Maurice Concrete Products, Inc. They charged that the state welfare commissioner wrongfully intruded in a labor dispute by making welfare payments available to strikers.

The companies contended that this amounted to state action altering the relative strength of labor and management, thus entering a field pre-empted by national policy which guarantees free collective bargaining.

The appeals court, in an opinion by Judge Frank M. Coffin upholding a lower court ruling, said that the question of whether the state is intruding on federal policy is a matter for Congress, not the courts. The court noted that Congress has provided minimum standards for state-federal welfare programs, but has said noting so far to limit the eligibility of strikers.

The decision also rejected the employers' argument that because strikers are disqualified from receiving unemployment compensation, welfare payments to them would be a violation of the law. The court said welfare and unemployment compensation laws are directed at different needs.

Court Ruling Pierces 'Shadow' Bargaining

St. Louis—A company that engages in "shadow" negotiations and does everything possible to avoid reaching agreement with a union is not fulfilling the law's requirement of good-faith bargaining, the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled here.

A three-judge panel of the 8th Circuit Court issued the ruling against the Ottenheimer Division of the Kellwood Co., Little Rock, Ark. It ordered the firm to resume bargaining with the Ladies' Garment Workers, reinstate strikers it refused to rehire, give them backpay and stop harassing union members and interfering with the rights of its employes.

Kellwood operates 36 separate plants and sells the major portion of its women's wear products to Sears, Roebuck & Co. The union said Sears is the principal stockholder in Kellwood.

The ILGWU called the court decision a vindication of its four-year fight to protect members' jobs and require Kellwood to abide by the federal labor law. It estimated that backpay due several hundred employes may total up to $10 million, less earnings on interim jobs since Nov. 25, 1967, the date of the NLRB order against Kellwood.

The court enforced the NLRB's demand that the company bargain in good faith and halt its unfair practices. It upheld all findings by the board, except one—that the company violated employe rights in showing the blatantly antiunion film "And Women Must Weep" to captive audiences of its workers. The court dismissed that finding on the ground the film's showing did not constitute a "prediction of violence or company reprisal" but was "nothing more than emotional antiunion propaganda."

The judges, rejecting Kellwood's claim that it had at all times engaged in good-faith bargaining, said too many facets of the company's conduct led to another conclusion.

The court agreed with the NLRB's finding that "throughout negotiations, the company used various means to embarrass and undermine the union in the eyes of its employes" while at the same time professing its good faith.

The company argued that its refusal to reach an agreement did not justify finding of bad faith "since it has every right to remain firm" and not accede to the union's proposals. The court said this was true as an isolated proposition but "an employer who remains adamant in his offer must subject his firm bargaining position to an appraisal of his good-faith intent as manifested by his over-all conduct."

The court said it had little difficulty in finding the evidence sufficient to sustain the NLRB's finding of bad faith. Further, it said, "we agree . . . the strike was precipitated by the company's unfair bargaining tactics. . . . There existed obvious strategy to force a collision course and obstruct bargaining."

Barbers' Union Elects Secretary-Treasurer

Indianapolis—Roy C. Emerson, new secretary-treasurer of the Barbers, took office upon his installation by Pres. Joseph N. DePaola. He succeeds E. M. Sanders.

Emerson, of Phoenix, Ariz., had been eighth vice president of the union, which represents barbers, beauticians and allied workers. He defeated William Knowles of Chattanooga in a union referendum, 19,164 to 9,770.

Widening Role Of HRDI Cited By Magazine

The wide-ranging operations of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute in assisting disadvantaged, unemployed and under-employed workers are featured in an article in the December issue of Manpower magazine, published monthly by the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

The article, "Putting Labor in Work Training," describes the institute's contribution to federal manpower programs.

It also points out the intricate duties of HRDI staff representatives across the country in coordinating the support of unions and employers on the local level.

"There are no job descriptions for HRDI staffers," the study notes, "for their jobs beggar description. They do what has to be done in the city where they are assigned. They are catalysts, honest brokers, exhorters, mediators, helping hands, and sympathetic ears, often to several parties at once."

The article, by Kenneth Fiester, also details the institute's involvement in Apprenticeship Outreach and Buddy programs aimed at recruiting, training and placement of minority workers in good jobs.

HRDI, established as a nonprofit corporation by the AFL-CIO in 1968, recently expanded its activities with a program to help returning servicemen find jobs or training opportunities.

Court Ruling Spurs Bids for Youth Vote

on literacy tests as discriminatory.

But by a different 5-4 majority, the Supreme Court found that Congress had overstepped its constitutional authority in applying the 18-year-old vote to state and local elections.

This means that states with a higher voting age will have to work out a system of separate ballots for 18-year-olds and older voters.

It is also likely to encourage state action to lower the voting age to 18 in all elections, and plans have also been announced to initiate a U.S. constitutional amendment to that effect.

At present, Alaska, Georgia and Kentucky allow 18-year-olds to vote, Massachusetts and Minnesota have approved the vote for 19-year-olds, and Hawaii, Nebraska and Maine have set or authorized a 20-year-old vote. The other states all have a minimum voting age of 21.

The importance of selective or general register-and-vote campaigns for the 1972 elections is pointed up by statistics showing that a smaller proportion of young people normally vote in elections than persons in the middle and older age brackets.

About half the potential younger voters are expected to be either high school or college students, with the remainder largely workers or members of the armed forces.

Nine major youth organizations followed up the Supreme Court decision with announcement of plans for a voter registration and voter education drive keyed to the 1972 elections.

The labor-supported, youth-operated Frontlash program, which helped register adult voters in the 1968 and 1970 campaigns, will concentrate on enrollment of newly-eligible voters, with special concentration on young workers and minority groups.

"We must work in the ghettos, barrios and with trade unions to see that the benefits of this important new law are brought to all younger citizens," the statement declared.

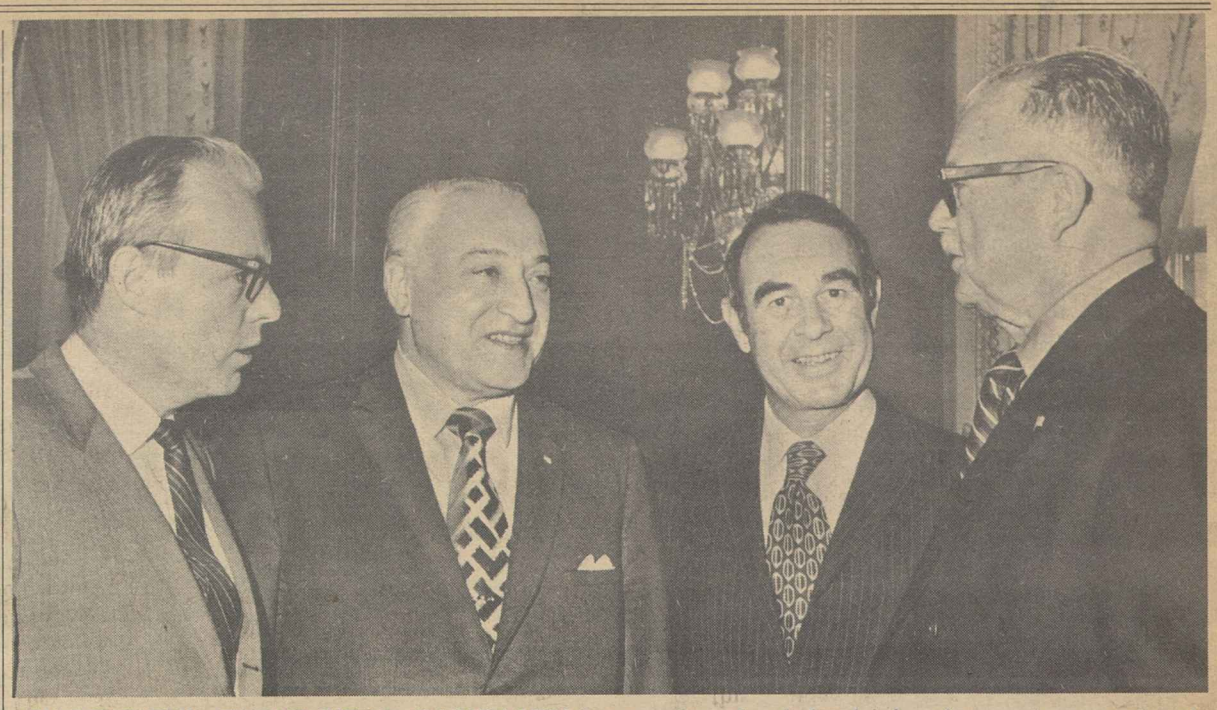
There is wide disagreement among political observers as to whether the voting pattern of young voters is likely to differ significantly from that of the over 21 population. However a Louis Harris poll recently showed Dmocratic Sen. Edmund Muskie supported by 49 percent of persons in the 18-21 age group, with only 22 percent for Pres. Nixon, 19 percent for George Wallace and 10 percent undecided. For the over-21 age group, the comparable figures were 46 percent for Muskie, 40 percent for Nixon, 10 percent for Wallace and 4 percent undecided.

The AFL-CIO has long supported lowering the voting age to 18 and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified for the lower voting age at House hearings last year.

The 18-year-old vote was added by the Senate as an amendment to a civil rights bill—a five-year extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act that struck down discriminatory barriers to voting by Negroes in southern states. The House then accepted the Senate version and Pres. Nixon signed it into law, although expressing doubt as to the constitutionality of the 18-year-old vote.



Hugo Black, the oldest of the Supreme Court justices, was the swing man on both 5-4 decisions.

Joined by Justices William J. Brennan, Jr., William O. Douglas, Thurgood Marshall and Byron R. White, he declared that Congress has "ultimate supervisory power" over federal elections and thus could establish an 18-year-old voting age.

But Black joined with the four justices who dissented on that first opinion to hold that Congress could not overturn the voting standards set by states on the basis of age for elections to non-federal offices. He agreed this time with Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Harry A. Blackmun, John M. Harlan and and Potter Stewart.

The court was so widely divided in its reasoning that five separate opinions, totaling 184 pages, were written in the case.

But the final effect was to open the ballot box to young people who up to now have had the obligations of citizenship without the right to a voice in the laws under which they live.

SUCCESSFUL THREE-YEAR CAMPAIGN for passage of a federal job safety and occupational health law is hailed by four of the people who helped make it possible. From left: Jack Sheehan, legislative director of the Steelworkers; chief sponsors of the bill, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Off-Broadway Strike Issues Go to Arbiter

New York—An agreement to arbitrate a contract dispute ended a 31-day strike by members of Actors' Equity in time for a Christmas week reopening of off-Broadway theaters.

Shows will go on while the union and management pick an arbitrator. The issues in dispute include wages, welfare and pension improvements sought by Equity for 200 actors and stage managers.

Executive Sec. Angus Duncan said one major gain for the union is in the field of video cassettes. Spokesmen for the League of Off-Broadway Theaters agreed that the actors' share of income from cassettes, used to broadcast show selections, will be negotiated for each show.

Wages are a major issue in the contract strike, which started Nov. 16. The players asked for a $125 weekly minimum, rising to $130 after three years. Management offered $90 a week, rising to $100 after three years.

The current off-Broadway minimum is $75 a week. On Broadway, the base pay for actors is $164.45 a week.

Twelve theaters were closed by the strike. All have fewer than 300 seats.

Jobs Bill Veto Sticks But Criticism Mounts

Efforts to salvage the extensive employment and manpower training bill in this Congress died with the Senate's failure to override Pres. Nixon's veto of the legislation. The Senate vote was 48 to 35, eight short of the needed two-thirds majority.

But supporters of the bill in Congress continued their criticism of the President for killing the measure that would have provided hundreds of thousands of jobs when unemployment is at the highest rate in more than seven years.

Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), a principal author of the public service jobs plan, accused Nixon of doing an about-face on the proposal.

It was this provision, which would have created 300,000 jobs for the unemployed, that the President found most objectionable, O'Hara noted, and yet Administration officials had fully backed the program before the November election when it passed the House.

There were only two changes made in the House provision that was finally sent to the President for signing—and neither change made a substantial difference in the program the Administration had approved earlier, O'Hara declared.

He also rejected Nixon's contention that the employment and manpower training legislation would create "dead-end jobs."

"That charge is false," O'Hara said.

He pointed out that there were adequate provisions in the legislation guaranteeing a link between training and real jobs.

O'Hara recited several sections of the legislation covering that area of concern, including one specifying "assurances that the applicant shall, where appropriate, maintain or provide linkages with upgrading and other programs under this act, and other federally supported manpower programs."

He also decried Nixon's reference to the public service jobs program of the legislation as being "WPA-type jobs."

"I am old enough to remember," O'Hara said, "that a WPA-type job was a whale of a lot better for the spirit and the stomach than a Hoover-type breadline."

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), chairman of the subcommittee that drafted the legislation, said that the veto leaves the nation's current training programs in disarray. He noted that the Labor Dept. is trying to monitor more than 10,000 contracts under the program that costs more than $1.5 billion a year.

Any attempt for passage of a new bill appeared unlikely before next fall, although the Administration has indicated it would submit a "reworked" manpower proposal to Congress early next year.

Public Service, Adventure Draw Union Families to Peace Corps

By Jane Van Sant

Why would a young family give up a comfortable home and a secure life to join the Peace Corps and travel to Venezuela for two years?

"Adventure" is one reason, according to Ronald Chaidez and Ronald Temsik, two union plumbers recruited as part of the Peace Corps "New Directions" program. "But honestly," Temsik added, "we really think we can do people some good over there."

Their wives are going as volunteers also, and the New Directions program permits the families to bring their children. The program was developed by Peace Corps Director Joseph Blatchford in an attempt to recruit more mature, skilled volunteers.

Chaidez and Temsik will become maintenance supervisors in a team helping to develop a decentralized hospital administration and maintenance system for Venezuela.

The 21-member group includes civil and boiler engineers and administrative analysts. Venezuela has some well-equipped medical facilities but desperately needs trained personnel to decentralize and extend quality health care.

United Nations agencies are studying the project as a possible model to meet the critical health needs of other Latin American countries. They are supporting this project with technical and financial aid, and the Pan-American Union is providing some support.

Ronald and Marilyn Chaidez first heard about the Peace Corps New Directions plan while watching Blatchford speak on a National Educational Television program. They liked the idea, and thought it would be a good experience for their children, Jeffery, 8, and Lisa, 3.

Chaidez, 29, is a member of Plumbers' Local 51 in Portland, Ore., and was employed as a plumbing supervisor.

Marilyn Chaidez, a school teacher, hopes to start a hospital recreation program in Valencia.

Temsik, 38, is a member of Plumbers' Local 575 of Boulder, Colo., and served as training coordinator for his union. His wife is a nurse and she plans to work in a small clinic in Valencia. They have three children, Tamara, 12, Taina, 11 and Tara, 8.

The families recently completed 15 weeks of Peace Corps training in Lexington, Ky.

They will have to find their own housing when they arrive in Valencia, Jan. 2. They do not plan to live near each other. "We don't want to form a clan, a little America," Mrs. Temsik said.

The Peace Corps will deposit $200 monthly in American banks for each family and pay their living allowances.

Temsik said of their decision: "The other guys in my local, at least most of them, said they wished they had the guts to do the same thing. But my boss thought I was crazy."

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 9, 1971, because of holiday schedules.

Court Orders Release Of Cesar Chavez

San Francisco — United Farm Workers Director Cesar Chavez was released from jail Dec. 23 after the California Supreme Court agreed to hear his appeal.

Chavez had been in jail since Dec. 5 on a contempt charge by a Monterey County Superior Court judge for refusing to call off a boycott and strike for UFWOC recognition in the lettuce fields.

Meanwhile, a UFWOC official has accused the Defense Dept. of attempting to crack the boycott by stepping up its purchases of lettuce sold by firms that do not have contracts with the union.

Morale among the farm workers remained high as hundreds of supporters brought food, clothing and money to UFWOC's sixth Christmas reunion in Delano, Calif. They pledged continued support of the union in the effort to put the UFWOC label on all lettuce.
